LUDENDORFF, at least, is henceforth out of the game—that is one consolation to be drawn from recent events in Germany. The expected monarchist putsch took place—but the monarchists were divided into Wittelsbach and Hohenzollern, South German and North German camps, and accordingly the first coup failed. Ludendorff, after all, was a Prussian alien in Munich, and Hitler, leader of the fascist forces, is an Austrian. Theirs was a strange alliance, and their beer-house revolution a singularly uninspiring performance. Hitler, firing melodramatically into the air to force attention from a feverish crowd, and escaping from an unheroic encounter with the police wounded only by the violence with which he threw himself on the ground when the firing began, has lost his glamor; and Ludendorff, once commander of an empire's forces, is an unsympathetic figure spending the night in a police cell and obtaining release by a promise to be good—which, once released, he interprets to mean nothing.

HITLER and Ludendorff were not defeated, however, because they were monarchists, but because they were the wrong kind of monarchists. The civil officials whom they arrested, and who soon turned the tables on the short-lived revolution, were no devoted republicans. They are Wittelsbach monarchists, devoted to Crown Prince Rupprecht of Bavaria, whom they hope to crown emperor of all Germany. They distrusted Hitler as likely to play a lone hand, and Ludendorff as too close to the old Kaiser. This conflict possibly explains Dr. Stresemann's readiness to permit the former Crown Prince and Kaiser to return to Germany. Discredited as they still are by their flight to Holland—and the Kaiser, curiously, by his second marriage—the return of the Hohenzollerns must increase the division in the royalist forces and weaken the cause of the Wittelsbachs. It is playing with fire, but fire is sometimes the best weapon against fire. The Allies will do well to make no protest which will restore the martyr's halo to Hohenzollern brows. Pictures of their lonely life in exile have helped restore a sympathy which they lost in 1918, and new measures are likely to help rather than hurt them.

THIS flurry of excitement about the return of the Hohenzollerns and about the beer-hall revolution has permitted the international reparations conference to die almost unnoticed. We called the pother about it a Much Ado About Nothing when it began, for it was plain from the beginning that M. Poincaré would accept no limitation of his freedom of action. He does not want to save Germany from collapse and Europe from decay. Day by day he is advancing in his negotiations with the big German industrialists who are more powerful than their Government, and completing treaties for the subjection of conquered economic provinces. That these treaties have no sounder footing than the wrecked Treaty of Versailles does not concern him; in his mind's eye that tragic ruin still stands intact, and when President Wilson in an armistice-day address asserts that France and Italy have torn it into waste-paper he is only angry. We prefer the blunt if cynical honesty of Bethmann-Hollweg in August, 1914, when he declared, of the invasion of Belgium, "This is contrary to international law." It was no more so than the conquest of the Ruhr. M. Poincaré refused to join in an international expert inquiry which would concern itself with anything more far-reaching than Germany's present capacity to pay—which, we all know, is nil. We are proud that Mr. Hughes refused to stultify himself by sharing in so piffling an enterprise. M. Poincaré is now planning a study by the Reparation Commission of this limited field; on that commission his representative, no technician but a hack politician, Barthou, holds the casting vote.

LLOYD GEORGE'S American tour seems to have given him a sort of springboard from which to dive back into British politics and to have healed the feud between him and his former chief. If anything was needed to complete the reconciliation with Mr. Asquith, the announcement of an election on December 6 upon the tariff issue provided it. An election upon the tariff issue means a return to the good old days for many Liberals who have found themselves rather at a loss in the wilds of post-war politics. Not one of them but won his diploma in the school of free trade in his younger days. A high tariff is always an alluring issue in hard times, and it would be rash to predicate a Liberal victory upon the free-trade tradition of Great Britain. But at least the Liberals will enter this election with their ranks united, and if Labor and the Liberals can avoid too many three-cornered contests they should be able to avoid the anomaly of the present Parliament, in which the Conservatives, with less than 40 per cent of the voters behind them, have a majority of 87 members.

ISRAEL ZANGWILL continues his habit of blunt truth-telling. "It would have been better for the world as things have turned out," he writes, "if you had never gone in [to the World War] at all. There would then have been a draw and militarism would have been killed instead of reviving in other countries." This is, perhaps, speculation, but the evidence is increasingly with Mr. Zangwill. "You shut out immigrants, instead of holding out hospitable hands," he said in a speech which some of his auditors resented. "And how did you get your country? You took it by force from the Indians, and your duty is to hold it in trust for humanity. You call it 'God's own country.' For God's sake make it so." Newspaper comment does not indicate that Mr. Zangwill was altogether right when he said of America: "You can stand criticism. 'Main Street' and 'Babbitt' have proved that. . . . You are too big for flattery, so big that you can hear the truth. . . . You are so good that, like Ford, you become the easy prey of crooks and cranks." And yet, essentially he is right. We are tired of toadying foreign speakers who disguise their propaganda in insincere flattery. Mr. Zangwill's bluntness may sting for the moment, but in the long run we will thank him for it. The man who gave us the mirror of ourselves as a melting-pot has a right to be shocked by our present-day attitude to our immigrants.

SECRETARY MELLON'S proposals for changes in Federal taxation are perhaps put forward as much in the hope of preventing a soldiers' bonus as with the idea that Congress will enact them as they stand. To defeat the proposed bonus is certainly worth accomplishing in itself, although it is a question how far an executive department should go in propagandizing in that way. Of course Mr. Mellon is correct in insisting that the country cannot have both lower taxes and the bonus, and the reductions that he suggests are well devised to obtain support both from those with small and those with large incomes. The proposed cut in the normal rates to 3 and 6 per cent, instead of 4 and 8 per cent, will appeal to persons of moderate earnings, while the suggested reduction for surtaxes from a maximum of 42 per cent on $200,000 and over to 25 per cent on $100,000 and over will commend itself to persons with larger incomes. A change in surtax rates will doubtless be opposed by agrarian elements in Congress, but Mr. Mellon's belief that his plan would produce as great a revenue through checking investment in tax-exempt securities is probably well founded. In any event the scandal of that kind of tax-dodging ought to be ended by forbidding further issues of tax-exempt bonds.

WHEN Charles F. Murphy, grand sachem of Tammany Hall, ordered Hearst's "filthy, lying newspapers" out of his home it was a symbol that Tammany no longer felt the need of even the Hearst newspapers. It controls New York City without benefit of the press. The most interesting aspect of the election in New York State was the knockout blow delivered by the voters to Hearst's political ambitions. In New York City the Republican nominees for justices of the Supreme Court, sponsored by Mr. Hearst, were snowed under by majorities of more than 100,000, despite Hearst and the other newspapers. In Syracuse the Hearst candidate for mayor was badly defeated, and the Hearst newspapers of the morning after election day were reduced to featuring the fact that the Republican candidate for mayor, supported by the Hearst newspapers, had carried Rochester. But it is a very old citizen of Rochester who remembers the day when Rochester did not elect the Republican candidate for mayor, and the palmiest days of Rochester Republicans long antedated the advent of Mr. Hearst's afternoon newspaper. Politically speaking, Mr. Hearst is dead. It does not matter whether he calls himself Republican, Democrat, Independence Leaguer, or what-not in the future; the politicians will no longer fear him. Mr. Murphy's announced determination never again to permit the Hearst papers in his pure home, however, is not likely to affect their circulation. Perhaps the most extraordinary feature of the extraordinary growth of some newspapers in recent years is that they grow most when their editorial pages have least influence.

Thirty thousand women employed in the confectionery, paper-box, tobacco, collar, and shirt industries and in mercantile establishments in New York State are receiving less than sixteen dollars a week. More than one-fourth of the women employed in these factory industries and more than one-fifth of the women employed in the State's mercantile establishments are receiving less than twelve dollars a week. Thousands of women in these industries and in mercantile establishments are receiving less than ten dollars a week.

THESE figures are taken from a study made by the Bureau of Women in Industry of the State Industrial Commission of the wages earned by 60,000 women workers in New York. Let us see what this means. The lowest wage that will support a family of five at a minimum level of health and decency is about $2,200 a year—forty-odd dollars a week. Almost all women workers, married and unmarried, contribute practically every cent they earn to the upkeep of the home. If a woman had only herself to support she would come near to starving on ten, twelve, or sixteen dollars a week. With children, parents, younger brothers and sisters dependent upon her, the figures printed above present a picture of utter desperation.

TO turn an institution of scholarly and advanced research into a business college specializing in commercial geography would be easier if it were not for attachments from the past that call out in protest. There are graduates whose professional standing is injured, whose memories are disturbed, whose love of true scholarship is outraged. Thus, following the protest of the Washington Alumni Club against the commercialization of Clark University, comes another signed by a score of persons prominent in education on the Pacific Coast. The Pacific Coast alumni, like others, demand the retirement of Wallace W. Atwood, the president of Clark, because they say his policies do not command the confidence of faculty or student body, have led to the loss of certain of the best teachers, and have lowered the scholastic standing of the university. The signers of the protest include the deans of three

The Lost Leader

ANOTHER gallant adventure in labor journalism is dead. The New York Leader, for a few weeks heir to the old Call, has furled its sails. At least it closes with its books balancing, able to pay its staff and meet its debts—thereby establishing something very like a record.

The unions which took over the Leader inherited from the Socialist owners of the Call a bankrupt paper, more ruinously in debt than its own managers had realized. They made an attempt to transform this little paper, with a brave record of courageous battling but a terrific burden of distrust and debt, into a real daily newspaper. They gave their new paper a sporting page, a women's column, comics, "colyums." Before they had their new craft fairly launched they ran into the storm of the newspaper strike. They attempted to capitalize the strike situation by printing huge editions of their paper to fill the gap. Circulation boomed, but their distributors sabotaged them. Their returns, and accordingly their losses, were tremendous. Before the paper changed its name they had spent more than half of their slender capital—only about $75,000 net.

The new paper found itself after the strike boom with 20,000 circulation—more than double the number of readers of the Call in its latter days. That was not enough to bring in much new advertising. The pledges from the unions which had taken over the paper were slow in coming in, and the management had committed itself to a more elaborate paper than it was possible to maintain upon the paper's income.

But there was more than that. A large part of the Leader's difficulty lay in the peculiar situation in the labor movement in New York City. The unions which owned the paper, and the men who edited it, belonged to the progressive group which has usually opposed the leadership of Samuel Gompers in the American Federation of Labor. Accordingly, some of the Gompers group were from the beginning hostile to it. Its support came mainly from the largely Jewish needle-trades unions. But the Jewish workers already have their labor dailies in their own tongue. Nor did the English-speaking members of the needle-trades unions give the paper the almost religious support which would have been necessary to make the paper succeed. That they did not was due to the factional strife within labor ranks. The Leader from the beginning dissociated itself from the disputes among its supporters and sought to advocate only a program upon which the various groups could unite. The result was that it won the intense loyalty of no one. The Communists and near-Communists would not support it, for it was not theirs—they were hoping to establish an English daily of their own in Chicago; and the Socialists did not love it because it did not throw itself into their fight to oust the Communists. The supporters of the Leader had hoped that it might help establish a unity which is sorely needed within the union movement. But they did not have money enough to give it a long enough trial. The old Call had a fanatical little group of die-hards who were ready to support it through any crisis with a kind of religious devotion. The Leader had only its merit as a newspaper to stand upon—and not enough people bought it for that. In a very real sense, it was too good to live. It was neither scandalous nor factional enough to please.

Does this mean that labor can never manage its own newspapers? We think not. It does, we think, prove that labor can have its own newspapers only when it is sufficiently united and strong to give them real and continued support; and an incidental lesson may be that it needs to hire managers trained in the school of business experience. But times will come again when labor will discover that it cannot trust the most liberal dailies of millionaire ownership, and will try again. Meanwhile labor has its own weeklies and monthlies—and they are growingly good.

The German Famine

WHEN the potato crop has been harvested in Germany, the farmers notify the government, which officially declares the fields open; hordes of miserable city-dwellers are then permitted to paw through the earth of the fields in the hope of finding a few potatoes so small or rotten as to have escaped the farmer's hands. Thousands of Berliners flocked to the country every day during the harvest-season for that feeble hope of nourishment. Returning travelers report that they sat with their backs to the street in restaurants because they could not bear to see the pinched faces staring in through the plate-glass windows. And this in autumn, the easiest food-time of the year.

We are face to face with another great famine. Behind the reports of Ludendorff-Hitler putsches, of the crown prince's return, of riots and Reichswehr movements, there is a steady story of hunger and disease. We have been hearing this story so long that our ears have become dulled to it. It is a more important story than the incidents which are chronicled in newspaper headlines, of vastly more significance to future generations, but it is the same old story, so it is not news. News is something new, something startling, and starvation is an old story in Germany, and no longer startles anyone. And when some American who has been caught in a riot of women mad for a loaf of bread reports the horror of the experience, someone else reports that there was plenty of food in the Hotel Adlon.

There is always plenty of food in the Hotel Adlons. In the midst of starvation there are always men who somehow hoard a little food, and others who have money to pay for it. Americans, who also have money to pay for food, see these men. They seldom stray into the working-class sections. Some of these cynical Americans expatiate upon the unemployment doles paid workers "for not working"; they do not stop to discover that when bread cost two and a half billion marks a loaf the unemployment dole for the head of a family amounted to a billion marks a day—two-fifths the value of a single loaf of bread.

The Russian famine was primarily a product of atmospheric conditions—of drought and heat. It was a famine of the country districts as well as of the cities. The German famine is otherwise. The German farmers have food enough for themselves, but they see no reason to exchange it for the worthless paper marks with which the cities are flooded. The two and a half billion paper marks that are worth one loaf of bread today may be worth only half a loaf next week or even tomorrow; the grain or potatoes that the farmer has in his barn do not lose their value. Naturally he sells only when he needs to buy something else on the same day. Germany is a manufacturing country that normally exports fabricated goods and imports foodstuffs. Her great manufacturing centers are in the hands of an enemy so that she cannot export; without exports she cannot pay for imports. Yet the German famine is no less real because it can thus be explained as an artificial product. It is terribly real today—and it will be worse in the coming cold weather, and in the early spring when new crops will have been planted but will not yet be ripe for harvesting.

We may still hope that our statesmen will find a way, despite the political difficulties on both sides of the water, to cut at the roots of the disease. But even assuming a greater measure of diplomatic success than now seems probable, the coming winter will inevitably be a famine-winter. Naturally Frau Kreisler cables her friends to "keep the Kreisler kitchens cooking." Naturally the Quakers in Germany cable home for help, pleading that:

> The past two weeks have brought the actual need to the surface in a way that one did not think possible. It has driven hundreds and possibly thousands into the streets to beg. One sees that they did not come out until the pangs of hunger and fear in the solitude of their four walls became unbearable.

It is hard to picture life in Germany today. One correspondent who left South Germany for a position in Berlin, found the only lodging available one hour by foot from his work. To ride in a street-car cost fifty million marks on the day of his arrival, a hundred millions the next day, two hundred the day after, and today costs some billions; he could not pay. No one can pay except foreigners and a few profiteers. The decay of Germany which has been in process for nearly ten years is approaching a climax. In Berlin they examine the six-year-old children entering school for signs of tuberculosis. Before the war half of one per cent were tuberculous; in 1921, 2.5 per cent; in 1922, 3.2 per cent; early in 1923 more than 5 per cent—and this autumn has brought by far the worst undernourishment yet experienced. A future generation is being ruined, and with it the hope of other generations to follow after.

The Quakers withdrew from Germany last year after two and a half years of child-feeding. Cooperating with Herbert Hoover they had raised and distributed more than $12,000,000 in American foodstuffs. It is not generally realized that the German government furnished the flour and sugar for this feeding—more than $5,000,000 worth of it—or that since August, 1922, it has paid the overhead expenses of the organization which continued on a reduced basis the Quaker feeding. When the Quakers retired, it seemed probable that thenceforth the Germans could finance their own relief. That was before the Ruhr, and the subsequent collapse. At the urgent appeal of General Henry T. Allen, formerly commander of the American Army on the Rhine, they are going back. Perhaps most of us in America thought we had done enough, but we too will have to go back.

General Allen's committee, which includes most of the men who once led war-time appeals for Allied relief, asks America for $5,000,000 now, and admits that $10,000,000 may be needed. Their program covers only a minimum meal for a quarter of the children who physicians say need such supplementary feeding. The weekly allowance for a child sounds trifling: 48 grams of fat, 18 grams of cocoa, 90 grams of sugar, 240 grams of evaporated milk, and 480 grams of flour. But it must be met, and only America can do it. The address of General Allen's committee—the American Committee for Relief of German Children—is 19 West 44th Street, New York City.

The Languid Generation

THE editors and managers of the undergraduate newspapers of a number of Eastern women's colleges sat together in the convention room and discussed their common problems. Intelligence and ability were obvious possessions of all of them. They had also the appearance of being entirely alive, which belongs only to people who have something of meaning and importance to do. They found the task of editing and writing college newspapers a baffling one and the problems that they faced resolved themselves finally into one problem: The students in the colleges were not interested in anything. Surely a discouraging fact to face, one which the editor of the Saturday Evening Post or the New York Evening Journal knows nothing about.

Should they print reports of lectures which the whole college might have heard and which were attended by a dozen students? Should they bring into the paper news of the outside world, and "try to interest the undergraduates" in matters of public significance? Should they talk about education in general and the curriculum in particular—to several hundred deaf ears? Or should they merely chronicle the interests of the majority; and if so . . . "But the majority has no interests." The delegates agreed on that.

They compared notes. One editor thought that if the students at her college could be said to read anything with eagerness it was collections of miscellaneous facts. "They like to know how many pieces of mail-matter come into the college and go out every week; how many bricks it took to build the new dormitory." Another delegate said that brief theater and book notes were read; another that a rather dreary humorous column was the thing the college turned to; another said that the discussion of college fads, such as the use of the swagger-stick, made matter that her public would read. "If the students at C—— would get excited about swagger-sticks I'd take it as a hopeful sign," said a cynical young woman in the front row.

A frail, passing interest in fads, the theater, books, facts, jokes—is this a foundation to build a paper on? The editors seemed hardly to think so. They looked in vain for some breath of hot feeling, some prejudice, some clash of ideas. And all they found was a languid tolerance for any idea. Modern students, it appeared, can not be shocked or won; they are pleasantly aloof from the bitter interests that tear the world. They read, but books are books to them, adjuncts to a serene academic progress—not chronicles of a living reality. The world is a little misty to them, a little remote, as if they were souls in some Maeterlinckian heaven waiting to be born.

No one would wish for the students of America the tortures of hunger, the clash of national and racial hatreds, the grinding effort by night and day, summer and winter, to secure enough money to buy learning. These things, characteristic of European universities, make life real enough, in all conscience, and education a thing to prize, but they warp the mind and blunt the sensibilities. Perhaps some compromise is necessary between hunger and complacency. Perhaps the generation that is being born out of our American colleges will have to rub against life a little before it really believes in it. Real interest is an emotion, and emotions spring from the needs of human beings, and so far in this comparatively comfortable land there has been little of Europe's bitter need for interest and intelligence.

Red Saxony

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Berlin, October 31

FOR three hours last Thursday I traveled from Berlin to Dresden opposite a young man in simple blue clothes without a single outward mark of distinction. He wore neither the frock-coat of statesmanship nor the high hat of the cabinet minister. He did have an attendant who once covered his knees with a rug and reminded my vis-a-vis that the time had come for him to eat his sandwich, which the Minister - President most obediently proceeded to do. If you had examined him closely, as I did, you would have seen a man who looked like a very earnest young American lawyer, a bit pale and obviously tired, but with fine bright eyes, a short upper lip, a high forehead with thick black hair brushed back somewhat after the style of the college boy in America. You would have agreed with me that it was a fine, sensitive face, the face of an enthusiast and of a thinker. You certainly would not have noticed any criminal traits, and so you would have been surprised to learn that this was one of the greatest criminals of today. Such he is in the minds of all who worship the god of things as they are and the god of private property and all the other gods whose feet no longer seem to be on solid ground but as in sand.

Ernst Zeigner and the Prussian Heel

For this young man of thirty-five was Dr. Zeigner, the Minister-President, or Prime Minister, of Saxony, the man who, having just declined to dissolve his Government at the behest of Berlin, has been ousted by force. I had heard him speak the night before and had been profoundly impressed by the direct and straightforward way in which he explained his position and declared his principles before a group of members of the League of the Young Republic, who cheered and applauded him the minute he hove in sight. He wasted no time in compliments or long-drawn-out words of thanks. He simply laid the facts of the situation as he saw them before these ardent young republicans, without thought of oratory, speaking far more rapidly than one would expect from a man trained to the law, for years a state's attorney and a judge.

He did not deny that there had been some Communist excesses in Saxony during July and August. The passive resistance in the Ruhr and the shutting down of industry there had had a most disastrous effect upon the factories of Saxony, which had actually suffered more from unemployment than any other portion of Germany. Saxony had a proletarian majority. It seemed to him that he and his associates, when they succeeded in getting two Communist leaders to take office in his Ministry, had achieved something not only unusual, unprecedented, but entirely praiseworthy. Did it not mean a good deal that German Communists had been induced to abandon their negative policy of obstruction, denunciation, and destruction, and to come into a Government to accept the responsibilities of governing, with all the chastening effects that those responsibilities brought in their train? That they had even taken the oath to uphold the Reich, the state of Saxony, and the Weimar Constitution? His audience, by its applause, agreed with him. But this was his offense, and not merely the existence of the "proletarian hundreds." He declared that the attack on Saxony came from government officials and soldiers "who have learned nothing and forgotten everything that has happened during and since the war."

Dr. Zeigner next spoke strongly against the conduct of the Reichswehr, asserting that their attitude was that of a conquering and invading army, and insisting that even if there had been undue lawlessness in Saxony it was not more than had existed in other portions of the Empire; that it certainly did not call for sending in thousands of troops. He had been told by a colonel of the General Staff in Dresden only that day that there were still eighty trains of troops to come in. As for the shooting down in the city of Pirna of some of the unemployed who were innocently gathered in front of the City Hall when the troops unexpectedly marched in, he said that being bent on perfectly legitimate business and in direct need of doles about to be handed out they had refused to disperse when ordered to do so. The troops immediately fired upon them, killing two and wounding many others, many of them being shot in the back, and reported the incident to Berlin as a "deliberate and well-organized Communist attack."

Dr. Zeigner assured his hearers, as he subsequently assured me, that he wished only that Saxony be let alone, and that he thought anyone a poor German indeed who would add to the trouble of the Reich in such stormy times. Yet he was sure that he was but living up to the Constitution both of Saxony and the Reich when he upheld the right of his Ministry to take into it Communist members. Dr. Stresemann had insisted that by retaining these Communist members and permitting them to attack the Reich Government in speeches and to call for its overthrow in favor of a proletarian government really devoted to the republic, Dr. Zeigner's Ministry was guilty of a violation of the Constitution such as could be atoned for only by the dismissal of the Communist members—a decision greeted with loud cheers by Hugo Stinnes's Deutsche Allgemeine Zeitung and all the houn'-dawgs of the extreme capitalistic press.

So the die has been cast. Dr. Zeigner and his Cabinet are out, and a Commissioner has been appointed to instal a new Government. The troops of Lieutenant General Müller, whose mental caliber and freedom from prejudice may be deduced from the fact that in one of his proclamations posted on the walls of Dresden he blamed the Communists for all the economic ills from which not only Saxony but all Germany is suffering, have driven the Zeigner Ministers out of their offices by force. In other words, the Stresemanns and the Stinneses and the 100-per-cent Germans of the open-shop, Civic-Federation type have triumphed.

Something very fine has gone out of Germany's political life with Zeigner. Other more experienced politicians will take the place of the Zeigner Ministry—it was perfectly obvious in the talk that I had with its head that he was without a background of political history and experience, and therefore was at a terrible disadvantage in dealing with Berlin. But whatever his shortcomings and his errors, make no mistake: in him Saxony has a high-minded patriot consecrated to the republican ideal and quite ready to make any personal sacrifice to that end. There is nothing of the fanatic or the visionary about him. He is no demagogue to stir up the masses. In our long talk he kept coming back to the constructive things that he was trying to do: First, to meet the existing emergencies and to help the unemployed; and, second, to place Saxon industry on a sound basis by completing the great electrical works near Zwickau which are to furnish cheap power not only to Saxony but even to the industries of Czecho-Slovakia and are to lift a good part of the burden of taxation by their profits. Then he told how he had succeeded in bringing about a settlement with the royal family by which many important art collections and public properties will be ceded to the state without a struggle and how upon the basis of these he hoped to raise a loan for the 30,000,000 gold marks he needed to complete the state's great electrical undertakings. Never have I talked with a ruler of a state who used the I as little and injected his personality so rarely into the conversation.

What a shock it would be to New York Times readers to talk to the two Communist ministers of Saxony, Heckert and Böttcher, about whom the whole storm arose. Both are clean-shaven, youngish men of the workingman type. Böttcher has been twenty years in politics, beginning life as an apprentice in the building trade. Heckert was until recently what we should call a job printer. His face was pale, his clothes coarse and sadly showing wear. The marks of the struggle for existence are written all over him. These men were slow to commit themselves to a journalistic stranger from America. But they were both perfectly clear in their minds that what is at stake in Saxony for the moment is not communism, but the life of the German Republic and the freedom of its working people. It is a class war which they feel is being waged against them. "We know now how our brothers in the Ruhr are suffering under the French, for we have the Reichswehr among us." They agreed that the "hundreds" were not being disarmed because the hundreds, according to them, are without arms and had never been organized in real military fashion.

They insisted in their quiet and serious way that there have been no grave Communist excesses in Saxony. Yesterday, however, I interviewed a Prussian Minister who has the reputation of being one of the most reasonable and fair-minded. When I told him that Dr. Zeigner had insisted that there was no undue lawlessness in Saxony he cried out emphatically: "Oh, we know differently. All sorts of terrible things have happened. Why, in one town the workingmen actually went into their factory, pulled out the owner, and made him lead a parade through the streets with a red flag which they thrust into his hands!" Of course, I murmured my sympathy and horror; I could well imagine how quickly there would be a lynching-bee in Gary, or Hammondsport, or Bethlehem, or Coatsville, or Pittsburgh if any of our American workingmen were guilty of an atrocity like that! Fortunately for my nerves he spared me any further details, and so I have been free to ponder on what is behind these conditions. The truth is that the attack upon Saxony was actuated by far different motives. Stresemann moved on Saxony, first, to overawe the Communists throughout the country; second, to spike the guns of those Bavarians who have been threatening to invade Saxony in order to attack the Communists and so get nearer Berlin; and, third, and most important of all, as a show of energy and vigor in the face of the reported intention of the Bavarians to establish a rump Reich-Government in Munich. That plan frightened Dr. Stresemann and his cabinet pretty badly. Many Ministers assured me that the Saxon maneuver was intended to place troops in a position where they could be rushed to the Bavarian frontier promptly. In other words, this reconstruction of the Saxon Ministry was a purely political maneuver. To me it seems a costly blunder. At the very moment when Dr. Stresemann is menaced from the Right he has alienated the multitudes of Socialists and workingmen of all faiths, who are now convinced that a dictatorship of the Reich is upon them. The danger of such a precedent is, moreover, great; if the Bavarians take charge of Berlin they will have an excellent example of how to get rid of the Prussian Government. All they will have to do will be to hire a few thugs to start up the Communists and to instigate rioting among the unemployed, and the trick will be done.

Nor do I believe that the maneuver will have the effect upon the Bavarians which Dr. Stresemann expects. The Bavarians regard themselves as engaged in the holiest of wars to purge all Germany of Jews, Marxians, and Communists—a feat which will, if achieved, in itself solve the problem of the overpopulation of Germany. Whether an armed conflict can still be avoided, whether a sort of Avignon government will or will not be established in Munich, whether the Bavarians will start their march on Berlin, as I happen to know General Ludendorff is urging them to do, may be told in America by the time this letter reaches New York. To prophesy is folly; the general belief is that Stresemann will yield his place shortly to a more violent reactionary, possibly a general, but of a type much more satisfactory to the militarists and the Bavarians. After that no man knoweth; most people look for a Communist dictator to succeed the representative of the Right.

But today all is quiet on the Elbe. Saxony has "got what was coming to her," and the world now has seen one more of the daily evidences of the tremendous success of the war to make the world safe for democracy. The only fly in the ointment is that on April 1 there were in Saxony 44,700 men and women drawing unemployment doles and 25,797 on short time, while on September 1 there were 41,425 unemployed and 126,146 on part time and on October 1 no less than 112,274 were unemployed and 349,566 were on short time. I am sure that if Elbert H. Gary were here just now he would be unable to refrain from repeating his remarks about Mussolini in this form: "I rather think that I ought to go home and tell our countrymen that we need a Stresemann in the White House."

The Tale of the Teapot

(The Nation's Weekly Washington Letter)

By WILLIAM HARD

NOW that the first senatorial hearings on the Teapot Dome Naval Oil Reserve affair have been completed, and now that all the star witnesses have shed their full if not their final rays upon the subject, it becomes possible for the first time to tell in assured detail and in coherent sequence the total story of the policy and behavior of the United States Government in the management of its naval oil estate, called the Teapot Dome, in Wyoming.

The first character in the story is President Roosevelt. He gave support and prestige to the policy of the conservation of oil in the ground for the use of the government at some future time when the customary commercial supplies of oil might be insufficient and when some great impending national emergency might demand a governmentally reserved and controlled abundant source of fuel for our fighting ships.

The second character in the story is President Wilson. Out of the Federal public domain in Wyoming he set aside for exclusively naval purposes a reserve called commonly the Teapot Dome and called technically Naval Oil Reserve Number Three.

The third character is Secretary of the Navy Josephus Daniels. He stood resolutely on the rights of the United States Government in Naval Oil Reserve Number Three and also in all of our other naval oil reserves, totaling five; and he refused to budge from those rights, when attacked by private citizens urging private claims upon naval oil-reserve lands. Under him the policy of the Navy Department was to resist private claims by every possible resource of administrative action in the government departments and by every possible resource of legal defense in the courts. Under him, at one time, when a certain other member of the Cabinet proposed to make a surrender of naval oil land to a private claimant without a fight, President Wilson told that other Cabinet member that any such behavior on his part would mean his resignation.

The stage thus having been set and the preliminary dialogue having thus been delivered, the fourth and final great character of the play was ready to make his entrance. This character is Albert B. Fall. Mr. Fall, as a Senator of the United States, had evidenced a great interest in conservation. His interest in it was that he disapproved of it. It was his view that the public domain of the United States should go as rapidly as possible into private hands.

Mr. Fall's first feat as Secretary of the Interior was to provide the State Department and the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee of the United States Senate with the oil-exploitation motives and arguments which led to the ratification of our $25,000,000 treaty with Colombia. Mr. Fall, as a Senator of the United States, had taken the position that the United States owed nothing to Colombia for any alleged violation of the national rights of Colombia in the matter of the setting up of the Republic of Panama in the days of President Roosevelt. Mr. Fall, as a Senator of the United States, had sided with the memory of Theodore Roosevelt against the claim of Colombia. As Secretary of the Interior, however, he perceived before him a divided duty. On the one hand there was the memory of Theodore Roosevelt which he had defended. On the other hand there was the opportunity on behalf of American oil interests to get from Colombia a new and open era of oil concessions. Mr. Fall chose oil.

He sent to the United States Senate a document in which the oil holdings of British oil companies in Colombia were listed; and in this document it was erroneously alleged that these holdings were holdings of the British Government; and on that argument, and in the openly admitted hope that for $25,000,000 out of the public treasury of the United States the Colombian Government would give oil concessions to the oil companies of the United States, the Colombia Treaty was passed.

Having thus demonstrated his willingness, at any cost to what he had once regarded as national honor, to secure oil concessions for oil companies, Mr. Fall was then picked out by Secretary of the Navy Denby to be made the managing master of the navy's oil reserves with this country. Known to be an anti-conservationist, and known to have been willing to take $25,000,000 out of the United States treasury to buy an entrance for American oil companies into the public domain of Colombia, he was made the supervisor of the navy's public domain in the United States.

This honor, however, was not heaped upon him by its own spontaneous gravitation toward him. He sought it. He wrote the order transferring the control of the naval oil reserves from the Navy Department to the Department of the Interior. He composed a letter for the Secretary of the Navy to sign, transmitting that order to the President to be signed.

Admiral Griffin, chief of the Navy Department's Bureau of Engineering, in charge of the naval oil reserves, objected to the transfer. Commander Stewart, in immediate management of the reserves, objected. No naval officer technically familiar with the naval oil-reserve situation is reported to have concurred in the transfer. Nevertheless Mr. Denby, choosing between the proved advice of his technically experienced officers and the proved passion of Mr. Fall for getting public lands into private hands, transmitted the order for the transfer on Mr. Fall's behalf to President Harding, who signed it on May 3, 1921.

Approximately one year later, on April 7, 1922, Mr. Fall leased the Teapot Dome Naval Oil Reserve to Mr. Harry Sinclair. For two weeks thereafter he made no announcement of his action. He then announced it only in reply to an urgent communication to him from Senator Kendrick of Wyoming who had heard rumors of such an action and who wished to know if those rumors were correct.

Mr. Fall, admitting that they were correct, lifted for the first time the curtain of secrecy behind which his action had been consummated. It then simultaneously appeared that the lease, besides being secret, had been non-competitive. No bids by others than Mr. Sinclair were disclosed. Mr. Sinclair, by himself, and in the dark, on his merits as oil man, as campaign contributor, as friend, and as hospitable owner of a private car suitable for personal conferences, had become the sudden owner of the total right to drill oil-wells over the whole of the Teapot Dome.

Then, after the event, came the setting forward of the alleged reason for it. This reason was, and is, that oil is said to be leaking out of the Teapot Dome Naval Oil Reserve into wells located on other federally owned public land just outside the Reserve. The Department of the Interior had granted the permits for the drilling of those wells. It itself had permitted and procured the activities responsible for the draining of oil out of the navy's reserved oil supply. It itself had authorized this indirect and partial loss of that supply. Its contention thereupon was, and is, that the loss should become direct and total.

Geological testimony adduced before the Public Lands Committee of the Senate in the course of its Teapot Dome hearings has been strongly to the effect that straight across the Teapot Dome there is a "fault" which protects a certain considerable part of it from leakage. The leakage from the remaining part of it was alleged by geological testimony to be likely to be perhaps not more than 25 per cent. It was convincingly demonstrated that there was a strong technical possibility that if the total oil content of the Teapot Dome is 25,000,000 barrels, then not more than 4,000,000 barrels of it was in danger of flowing away into the private wells on the adjoining public domain.

It now appears that from the wells which on adjacent public domain are draining oil out of the Teapot Dome the government gets royalties averaging from 25 to 50 per cent of the flow, whereas from the wells which Mr. Sinclair has sunk in the Teapot Dome itself the government is getting royalties averaging less than 20 per cent. From the standpoint of income in oil for the government it thus appears that the government was better off when the oil was coming to the surface in the wells which were called a "menace" to the Teapot Dome than it is now when the oil is coming to the surface within the Teapot Dome in Mr. Sinclair's wells.

It further appears that perhaps two-thirds of the oil which Mr. Sinclair will pay to the government in royalties will not remain in the possession of the navy in the form of oil. Perhaps two-thirds of it will be paid back to Mr. Sinclair by the navy for some tanks in which to keep the remaining one-third of it.

It has been customary for the Navy Department, when it feels in need of tanks or of guns or of battleships or of money with which to pay its employees, to ask Congress for it. It has also been customary to believe that when the people of the United States gave the Navy Department a lot of oil in the ground of the public domain, it gave it to the Navy Department to be a supply of oil and not to be a means by which it could purchase other supplies without going to Congress for authorization.

Under Mr. Fall's influence, however, the Navy Department proceeded to sign contracts for the building not only of tanks but also of docks and of channels leading to the docks on the basis of paying for these things with oil out of naval oil reserves. Thus not only was this oil taken out of the ground, where President Roosevelt had wished it to be left, but, having been taken out, a large part of it was spent, or will be spent, in acquiring things other than oil and in escaping the customary legalistic squeamish necessity of going to Congress for the people's consent to naval expenditures.

If in the Teapot Dome there were originally 25,000,000 barrels of oil, and if Mr. Sinclair now gets all of it out, the government, at the present running rate of royalties, will get—at the most—5,000,000 barrels. Of this 5,000,000 barrels, at the present running cost of materials, it will pay back to Mr. Sinclair some 3,333,000 barrels for tanks. It then in those tanks will have the residuum of its Teapot Dome inheritance—namely, some 1,666,000 barrels of oil out of an original total of 25,000,000; and it will have it not in the ground, where it would be totally safe to be used at some future time in the forms which that future time with new technical developments might unfold and require, but in metal containers in seashore positions and in manufactured forms and qualities which the technique of this passing and changing moment has fixed.

Either this result is an absurdity or else President Roosevelt, with his policy of naval oil conservation, was an idiot.

Theodore Roosevelt, Jr., Assistant Secretary of the Navy, did not make the decisions which have brought his father's naval oil policy to frustration, nor did he have knowledge of them while they were being made.

The Roosevelt naval oil conservation policy is dead, and the final stab given to it was by the same man who stabbed the Roosevelt justification of the Roosevelt Panama policy to the heart in the Colombian Treaty.

Senator Walsh of Montana, a member of the Senate's Public Lands Committee, a man of the deepest learning, a man of the highest personal probity, a man who morally is not capable of deception and who mentally is not capable of self-deception, has taken the leading part in the toilsome task of eliciting the pivotal facts from the chaos of the bewildering situation presented in testimony to the committee; and he has seemed to be moved toward entertaining the belief that possibly the contract leasing the Teapot Dome to Mr. Sinclair is illegal in that there was no competitive bidding for it and in that it includes provisions for the purchase of naval supplies—namely, tanks—not with money from Congress but with oil which already was naval property and which was not negotiable.

Meanwhile, however, Mr. Sinclair has long been at work drilling the Teapot Dome and draining oil from it; and Mr. Fall, having retired from office, has entered the employ of Mr. Sinclair and has visited Russia to induce the Russian Government to allow Mr. Sinclair to drain oil from the Russian public domain in Sakhalin.

Thus Mr. Fall departs from the story, carrying with him his well-known fear of a British world-wide monopoly in oil and having done something to exhaust our government's reserved supply of oil in its own country and having done nothing to acquire for it any other reserved supply; and if ever this country comes to be without oil while in Latin America north or south of Panama there still are undrained reservoirs of it, the ultimate chapter of our abandonment of our naval oil conservation policy will be written.

It will be written in intrigues and aggressions, diplomatic or military or both, to acquire abroad the naval fuel security which was ours for the keeping at home.

NEW MEXICO: A Relic of Ancient America

By ELIZABETH SHEPLEY SERGEANT

NEW MEXICO has an austere and planetary look that daunts and challenges the soul. In the East and the Middle West, the honors are nowadays relatively even between man and nature. In much of the West and the Southwest they are not, and in New Mexico the game is still so heavily loaded on nature's side that the life of the citizen is profoundly affected. Although the fourth of our States in area—three-fifths the size of France, with single counties as big as Wales or Scotland—New Mexico has a population smaller than that of many an American city. Evenly distributed, there would be about three persons to the square mile. In contrast to chill snow peaks, and mesas that drop starkly to rivers running naked in their canyons, the few little clusters of human habitations which the flowing mountain ranges have secreted at their bases seem as negligible as the burrows of the prairie dogs.

For all that, the State has fabricated out of soil, and climate, and racial stock a special brand of civilization, an individual pattern for life to run in that is of peculiar interest in the record of American States. The newest in the Union, it boasts two cultures as ancient as anything on our continent, as little modified by centuries and circumstance. It is still without the machinery of modern industrialism except in the depths of mines. Flocks and herds and agricultural crops support the greater part of its economic life. But many of the Indians and Spanish Americans, and even the now dominant fair-skinned settlers still live, in their vast colored solitude, as pioneers in space and time, more closely huddled together than New Englanders outside of big cities. The Pueblos are sheltered like monks in their walled villages and terraced community houses of sun-dried brick. The "Mexicans," in their intramontane valleys, which are often mere rock crevices with a mountain stream in the middle and the width of a fertile field of wheat on either side, set their little dice-like ranch houses end to end. Where their dwellings have space to be wider spreading, as in their Palestinian villages, they have a semi-fortified look; the same flat roof covers three or four generations, which cling together patriarchally. The old Spanish towns of importance, as one may discover in Santa Fe, were drawn tight about plazas and streets edged with colonnaded sidewalks, and their many religious and conventual buildings, which lift slated mansards to the blue sky, are as secretly inclosed as in France or Spain. Bernalillo, an old Spanish town, built on the site of an Indian pueblo where the army of Coronado made its first winter quarters, has an air of being religiously set in walls and gardens against the assaults of a dangerous universe. The genuinely frontier towns, like Gallup, near the Arizona line, important as trading centers for sheep or mining or Indian country, are no more than a raw street or two on the edge of infinity. Even Albuquerque, the only bustling modern city of any size, gives no effect of proud assertion: Sandia Mountain, floating above, carries off all the magnificence.

In an hour or two on horseback one may pass from the desert, with its dusty evanescent lights and pale lunar convulsions, through the rich green of an irrigated valley filled to the rim of its sandy pink foothills with corn or alfalfa, where mint and cottonwoods grow thick along the running ditches, and up into the virgin pine forest of the mountains, a place of blue-black shadow. Two or three more hours, and the high sheep range opens its vistas, fabulously vast, yet green and smooth and soft as an English park. Even in the desert, the purple vetches and petunias of early summer, the scented sheets of yellow that mark August and September, the gray-green sagey growths give color and fragrance to aridity. Owing to the altitude, nowhere less than 2,500 or 3,000 feet, tropical vegetation such as one finds in Arizona is lacking. Even the extreme south, along the Mexican border, is a land of perpetual summer. In the more northerly counties, like Taos and Santa Fe—the State capital is built at some 7,000 feet under the Sangre de Cristos, which rise to a jagged 14,000—snow may fall at any time between September and June, and spring winds blast the fruit blossoms; while summer sends to the ripening crops anything from torrential rains and cloudbursts to the most blasting drought. But somehow there is always enough hot sun and golden weather (there is the South of it) and enough zest in the brilliant air (there is the West of it) to keep the soul of the agricultural land alive, and brace men's hearts for new struggles.

Climatic adversity and violent human conflict have always been the lot of the natives, one learns from history and from the fascinating records of vanished races that lie on the scarred surface of the land—or just below. Besides the few that have been studied by the archaeologists in the last quarter-century, thousands of unexcavated cave and cliff ruins loom over the New Mexico canyons, giving the transplanted Kansas farmer or the grocer of the Kiwanis Club an upsetting vision of human destiny. The Spanish records name many aboriginal populations which have wholly vanished today. When the florid Conquistadores—the bulk of them, the historians tell us, the younger sons of Spanish noblemen, sent out to make their fortunes—arrived in this country, about a century before the sober Pilgrims were landing on the gray New England rocks, the red man was, of course, in sole possession. The Conquistadores' chief objective was, unlike the Pilgrim's, frankly materialistic: treasure, first the supposed treasure of the Seven Cities of Cibola, from which the present pueblo of Zuni, in the western part of the State, descends. But these adventurers were genuine explorers, and the province claimed as New Mexico, in the name of the Spanish Crown and the Holy Catholic faith, by the strong arms of the generals and the determined devotion of the Franciscan friars, included, in 1700, what are now Arizona and Utah, most of Colorado, and parts of Kansas and Texas. The official figures of the population, in 1799, were 23,000 Spaniards and 10,000 Indians, living in missions.

Modern New Mexico history begins about 1821, when the province passed from Spain to Mexico, and the opening of the romantic overland route to the United States gave a region that had lived chiefly by its southern connections a trade outlet to the East. This was the moment when the names of Otero, Luna, Baca, Romero, Ortiz, and others famous in territorial history—some still to be reckoned with in State politics—came to the fore. The Mexican government made large grants of land to leading individuals. These reinforced the older Spanish grants, and the Spanish Catholic gentlemen, established, some of them by many previous generations, in their great ranch houses, with their patriarchal families, their great flocks and herds, their practically peon labor of their own racial stock, and their Indian "slaves," were, if not kings, at least barons in their own right. That picturesque and privileged and quasi-feudal system in land tenure, stock farming, government, which has carried over into the present social and political system of New Mexico, goes straight back to these gentry.

The American era, following the military occupation of General Kearney in 1846, and the treaty of Guadelupe Hidalgo, by which the territory passed to the United States, initiated a new struggle: the Spaniards, like the Indians before them—but with a much more bitter reluctance—had to yield moral and commercial sovereignty to a race backed with more money and resources than they could now put forward. It was a slow and gradual and subtle process. The country was wide and undeveloped beyond all avarice and exploitation. But as the pioneers of the Santa Fe trail, traders, miners, sheep ranchers, and the rest—quite as arrogant and unscrupulous and ready with the six-shooter as the Spanish settlers—filtered in, and later the building of the railroads introduced new elements of progress and competition, including "wild catting" in mines, the old Spanish families began to lose their supremacy and their land. The ones who did not must have been those in whom the sensitiveness of the Southern aristocrat had been thoroughly tempered by Western air and sun; who were not only tough enough to endure the competition of a race that esteemed itself superior, and adaptable enough to Americanize themselves, but shrewd enough to use their old prerogatives over the inarticulate mass of their own race to secure for themselves a new sort of political hegemony.

The fate of Arizona was joined to that of New Mexico till 1863, when the former became a separate territory, and both were admitted to statehood by the Enabling Act of 1910—New Mexico in 1912. But Arizona's greater pioneer remoteness from the capital of Santa Fe and the older Spanish settlements made her formative history rather different, and her burning modern problems are more involved with the mining industry than with the ancient prides, grudges, and traditions noted above. The superficial observer, savoring in New Mexico something more closely resembling European "atmosphere" than he finds elsewher in this country, does not at first realize the degree to which what may be called the Spanish complex influences the conscious and unconscious mind of the State. He will be surprised to discover that Spanish is more often heard than English in many country districts, and that he cannot bargain for a horse or a beautiful old hand-woven blanket or a night's lodging without the mediation of a child who has learned English at school. The State constitution provides that for twenty years after it goes into effect laws shall be published in both Spanish and English, and that no citizen shall be deprived of the right to vote or sit on juries or hold office because of his inability to write or speak English or Spanish. As a matter of fact, until very recently sessions of the legislature—in the memory of many opened with six-shooters—have been conducted in Spanish or bilingually, through a Spanish interpreter, and the interpreter is an important figure in the courts, where, though the judges are usually "American," the juries are preponderantly "Mexican." The Republicans attribute much of their success with the women voters to the fact that they send out Spanish-speaking women canvassers. Twenty counties are more than half Spanish in population, a few almost 100 per cent. Even the Pueblos, with five root languages of their own, and no love for the "Mexicanos," use the Spanish tongue commonly for inter-tribal communication.

That only the Indians are spiritually free in New Mexico is one of the paradoxes in which the State abounds. For of course they are at the bottom of the social scale. The man from Main Street (Santa Fe) loves to tell the Eastern tenderfoot that these lazy Indians own much land which sure ought to be in the hands of white men. As a matter of fact they own, or occupy on reservations, four million acres out of seventy-eight millions, while the private land grants, so useful to the cattle interests, validated by the Court of Private Land Claims, amount to six millions. There are some 20,000 Indians all told—the least of the tribes in numbers and importance being the once fearful Apaches, some of them the descendants of Geronimo, living on two reservations, the Jicarilla in the north and the Mescalero in the south central part of the State—which ex-Secretary Fall tried last year unsuccessfully by a venture of his own called in New Mexico "the spotted park bill"—to transform into a National Park. In the northwestern corner of the State live the Navajos, 9,000 of them—there are 25,000 Navajos on the entire reservation but only one corner of it lies in New Mexico—a race of nomadic sheep farmers speaking a language quite as difficult as ancient Greek, and so protected by canyons and sand that nobody had bothered much about them but the traders who make a profit from their wool and their fine blankets, and the white sheepmen who carried on a sort of border warfare over grazing rights till oil began to gleam like a jewel in their foreheads. The other large Indian unit, the Pueblos, have from a long time past been jealously regarded, through their ownership of rich agricultural grants scattered through the Rio Grande valley. They have suffered many encroachments upon both land and water from white and especially Spanish-American settlers; and by a deal put through by Fall and Bursum, through which the voters would greatly have profited, they would last year have lost forever but for the national uprising against the Bursum bill all the disputed portions of their territory. The New Mexico politicians still attribute their defeat to "paid propaganda." Meanwhile the Pueblos have never lost their poise in the universe of being. In the midst of these contending dominant races which they have watched this long while with appraising eyes, their balanced communal life, their beautiful primitive handicrafts go on. And their extraordinarily decorative dances and religious ceremonies, carried on in the sun-baked plazas against the Gauguinesque background of the mountains, seem to release from the tensions of altitude and climate the inner mystery and sensuous harmony of the immemorial earth.

The simple Spanish folk whom the Kansas colonist misprizes are also charming to look upon, with cherished and curious traditions dating far into the past. Winnowing their grain in baskets, weaving gay blankets on hand looms, dancing old folk dances, and singing old Spanish tunes to the tinkle of guitars, they look in their mountain villages, under the shadow of their great mission churches, as if they had just emerged from a peasant pastoral like their own Our Lady of Guadelupe; a miracle play given at Christmas in the dark-ceiled, whitewashed interiors. Hard working, or as much so as sun and poco tiempo will allow, seriously undernourished on a diet of beans and chile, honest and law-abiding and proudly independent on their ranches, they are harder to account for through the years and centuries, with the ascetic ardors of their Penitente rites, and the black shawls of their heads, than the Spanish-American aristocrat. Though they probably have a dash, acquired perhaps some time since, of Indian blood, they are in no way to be confounded with the peon Indian-Mexican of Old Mexico—nothing insults them so much as to be called anything less than the good Americans that they are. But the little wrinkled Don Quixotic person who smiles at one from his blue door, the señorita, so powdered in her hours of ease, who haunts the Santa Fe plaza, consider themselves bound by ties of true kinship to Nina Otero Warren, descendant of the Conquistadores, sister of the powerful Eduardo, high in Republican councils; herself the first New Mexico woman to run for Congress. And Nina Otero talks of them and loves them as "my people."

Ten years ago it was customary, in a certain valley—so the "white" farmers tell me—for the "native" voters to receive their ballots neatly marked and wrapped in a two-dollar bill, as they mounted the hill to the schoolhouse. Last year on the election day which gave the Democrats their unexpected landslide, the representative of a certain candidate was walking up and down in this schoolhouse, among husky farmers and black shawls, grumbling loudly: "What's the matter with these women? They've all had their five dollars——" After this somebody carried out the ballot-box and somebody else made a row. A stranger to New Mexico might misunderstand this little scene. He would be wrong. The Spanish-American usually votes as his father advises over the morning cigarette. And his father advises what the local Don advises, on the advice of his cousin in Santa Fe. The control of the Spanish-American vote by the Republican Party, which has usually held the balance of power, has been worked out through an elaborate "padrone" system in the counties and a strong Spanish-American leadership at the top, with men of the Bursum and Fall variety pulling the strings in the background. There is no saying that a greenback passes more often here than in New York City or that one party is more simon-pure than the other in this regard. As with Tammany, a job may be a return for a tribute of loyalty, given by those who for so many centuries took their orders from the patriarchal master of the hot heart and strong hand.

Surely much of what happens in New Mexico may be attributed to overweening nature. Mountains may set you free, like a Chinese sage, in the contemplation of Everlasting Truth, or they may merely project your giddy egotism into the empyrean, and then hurl it back into the timid harness of the taboos and privileges and prohibitions of a clan. New Mexico communities, in spite of the many benignant gifts of God, are dominated by spectral fears from which those who rub elbows under the shadow of skyscrapers are liberated. Free speech is undoubtedly less flourishing here than in Boston. Public opinion is likely to get snarled up in private personalities and "small-town stuff." Opposite factions do not sit down at the same table and discuss their differences. An Indian claim has never had a fair deal in the lower New Mexico courts. A gentleman of the Republican persuasion may be asked by his clan to renounce friendship with a sister turned Democrat. The real reason why the "artist" who now figures as a definite element in the social grouping is so resented by a certain type of average citizen is that he is an iconoclast who does not live according to Hoyle—who hesitates, perhaps (it is not so sure) to steal his neighbor's water, as ranchers habitually do, who likes, actually likes as human beings these Indians and Spanish people, and wants them to continue in their benighted ways; and gazes upon the purple land and breathes the crystalline air with no feeling but of sensuous enjoyment and spiritual liberation.

The nearest problem of the State is to assimilate the racial stocks without sacrificing their worth, to become progressive without cheapness. If the picturesque features, like Indian villages and Spanish missions, become as in California merely tourist attractions played up by hotelkeepers and chambers of commerce, the last fate of the Indian will be worse than his first and the rare distinction of the State will vanish away. And there is no telling what future developments in the rich and largely unexploited mining and oil fields will do to the civilization and the landscape. The archaeological possibilities of this region, where a pottery jar as fine as any in Crete can be had for the digging, have as yet scarcely been suggested. One can conceive of future schools of art and decoration, music and the theater, based on native strains, which would produce in pupils of Indian or Spanish or long-established American-Southwestern provenance a flowering of creative American expression of a totally new sort. The colonist artist or writer of today, struggling to present the violent images registered on brain or retina can point the way: no more. Before the ceremonial dance paintings of the young Pueblo painters which come straight out of instincts fundamental as the earth, they must bow their heads in reverence and say—here, classic still and luminous, is the pastoral of ancient America.

III. Aristocrats

"WELL, well, what is happening in France? Do tell me. It's so long since we've heard anything about Paris."

The Countess's chin emerges eagerly above a cameo, from which flows a cascade of black lace. She strokes the gray locks rebellious on her forehead and pats her skirt of black silk.

"I should prefer, Madame, to hear you tell me how you have managed to live during the past five years, what you have been doing——"

"Ah, don't speak of it. I can't tell you in words. It has been hell, nothing less, hell."

She observes the sincere sympathy in my face.

"Ah, the scoundrels, the low creatures. But it just occurs to me, Madame, and I am terribly sorry: perhaps you haven't had lunch yet? Please do me the honor of sharing my modest meal with me. Don't refuse, I shall be disappointed. Oh, I know that, in comparison with the dinners you enjoy in Paris, our own poor meal will seem pathetic to you. Dear me, where are the fine feasts of the old days! The table was set all day long in those days. Our friends could drop in at any hour, and all we had to say is help yourself. There were hors d'œuvres, smoked fish, caviar, ham, whole chickens, ten kinds of fish and five kinds of confitures, pancakes, watermelon, wine from the Caucasus—what wasn't there? And it was the same in every house that had any pride in its hospitality. Ah, one can well say that things have changed."

Despite myself, I yield to the voluble and energetic hospitality of the Countess and follow her into a room even more somber, in which a huge Renaissance chest, massive and imposing, seems to bar any further advance.

"Sit down, I beg you."

I sit down before a table covered with red and blue embroidery, at one end of which a samovar and its row of cups rise like an altar made of nickel and porcelain. My hostess reaches for a little bell on the table. A maid with hempen hair, who had opened the door for me, enters with two steaming plates, which she places before us.

While I sip the excellent soup, tasting of cream, the objects in the room, one by one, slowly emerge from the obscurity. Behind the Countess I descry a copper bed, covered with a garnet counterpane and piled with a profusion of richly hued cushions. Nearby, an Empire bookcase, crammed with books in disarray, and on it I discern the turquoise glint of two Persian vases. Before the bookcase, three arm-chairs in red plush in close file and somewhat hidden by gilded chairs, graceful and handsome, like those one sees in a ballroom.

"Imagine how we have to live," exclaims the Countess, with her spoon indicating her surroundings. "Three rooms to live in. How can we manage it, we who were accustomed to our four drawing-rooms? My husband sleeps here, in the dining-room," she adds, her spoon indicating the bed, "while I have to make the most of a couch in the adjoining room. Ah, believe me, it isn't very amusing. Things are a little better than they were. But at first! I often wonder how we ever survived it."

I scarcely dare ask the question that comes to me. "Perhaps you have lost some of your dearest——?"

"No, Heaven be praised, all my family is safe. Some of them have even been able to escape and find refuge abroad. But everything has been taken from us, you understand, everything. We owned vast estates, near Tambov, and they parceled them out to the peasants. We owned a superb estate, with a huge park, two hours' distance from here. They turned it into an orphan asylum. And all my jewels. My maiden name was R——, perhaps you know it. My mother owned an emerald diadem and a pearl necklace which were famous. Well, they took those, too. And even my husband's books. He was a great collector, but they did not spare his rarest books. Our gold and our bonds: believe me, everything!"

The silent servant, who has placed before us on the table a plate of chops à la Pojarski and an enormous platter of potatoes has vanished again. But the eyes of the Countess are lost in retrospection still.

"And the persecution!"

I ask: "You were imprisoned?"

"No, thank Heaven, we were spared that, too. But think of it, for eighteen months I didn't undress once during the night. All night long, with our ears at the keyholes—can you imagine what that is? To think that, at any moment, we might be placed under arrest. And the searches: three times in two months."

My hostess is so engrossed in her tragic memories that she empties the whole jar of marmalade into her beautiful Saxony plate. How can I discreetly ask the question which has been in my thoughts? As though she had divined it, she resumes: "Poor Serge, he has changed so. Work, at his age. Earn his bread, when we owned one of the biggest fortunes in Russia. He is now curator of the F—— Museum, did you know? He is so busy just now with the new catalogue he is preparing."

And then, with the quick transition of thought so characteristic of the Russians: "By the way, Madame, if you care for Russian music, do us the honor to come tomorrow night to the home of Princess D——. Twice a month (she has been lucky enough to retain her big drawing-room) we have a concert at her home. Many people go there. Two million rubles per person. Would you like a ticket? You'll hear a young woman sing Moussorgsky's child songs as you've never heard them sung before."

I accept. She is delighted. And I see an opportunity to probe deeper into the matters I want to know about. "But how do all these women, your friends, manage to live?"

"Madame, some of them are in a frightful situation. Perhaps you have heard speak of the Countess Ch——?" The name she utters has traversed the whole history of Russia. "The Counts Ch—— in the thirteenth century possessed larger estates, owned more jewels, had authority over more lives than the Czars themselves. Well, she herself, who was mistress of whole provinces and of marble palaces, now lives in the cellar of one of her own houses.

Her cook lived there before. And she, I can assure you, has remained a fighter. There are some who have yielded, but she—they offered her employment, quite important positions, but never, never will she accept anything from the Bolsheviki. She would rather die than eat their bread."

"Still, one must eat."

"Alas, yes, one must eat. What can she do? She sells what little has been left to her: precious tapestries, rare jewels, silver, works of art, everything. I know that the extent of her possessions in the old days would dazzle your imagination, but just the same there is an end to everything, and the day will come when she will have nothing left."

"And the strangest thing of all," continues the old lady, her eyelids narrowing venomously, "is that all the six children of the Countess Ch—— are now in the employ of the Soviets."

"They have been converted?"

"Oh, no, how can you say that? But, after all, they are youngsters, and, as you said, one must live."

Night has now invaded the room. The volubility of the Countess is suddenly exhausted. In the silence I hear the soft hiss of steaming water-drops falling into a large silver bowl from the faucet of the samovar.

"Off?"

"Yes, yes, off. Off for Stettin!"

Softly the boat turns, leaves a curved trail in the ice-gray water of the Neva, and speeds toward the point of Vassilievski Ostrov. Already, to the left, the Admiralty and the Winter Palace melt in the mist. Once more the six old ladies, who seem to have stepped out of a Turgenev novel, wave a final adieu to the Lilliputian group on the pier. Petrograd disappears.

The women have found their seats in the dining-saloon. The oldest of them has kept on her wide cape of black material lined with squirrel over her homespun tailor-made suit padded with numberless sweaters, and she is so bulky that she had to be assisted to squeeze into her chair. All the others have made a hasty toilette: one, with a graceful carriage, has on a hooded cloak, and on the bosom of her neighbor there ripples a jabot fastened with a crown set with perfect diamonds. The smallest of the women is really charming: erect, winsome, she smiles as though she were asking pardon for breathing, even for existing.

"Our nightmare is over at last!" cries the woman in the hooded cloak. "I can hardly believe it."

"Those are the two Baronesses M——," whispers my neighbor, indicating the woman who has just spoken and another whose blotched face is framed in a black mantilla. "They were often guests at Court, and they were very close to the imperial family."

"To be able to say at last what we really think! Nothing to fear! To be able to tell them the truth abroad, tell them what we saw with our own eyes!" exclaims the young woman with the bilious countenance. Exclamations intermingle. Now in pure French, now in German, now in accentless English—never in Russian—the conversation rises almost to the point of exaltation. The bosoms of the elder women puff, their eyes shine: "What will you have, Alexandra? I'll take wine. I want to drink to a day that I never expected to live to see. Waiter, a bottle of Bordeaux."

They impress me as a witness. "We suffered so much."

"Tell me."

"My dear woman, it was death. Submission to the laws of the lower classes! To see in their eyes the disgusting triumph of brutes who can be inspired only by vodka and the whip! We had to do our own cooking, can you imagine: we had to do it ourselves!"

"I had a rare collection of miniatures," interrupts the winsome young woman. "They took it away. I understand they put it in the Hermitage Museum at Petrograd."

"And what meals," the younger of the baronesses resumes. "Kasha, potatoes, and tea—for five years. And there were times when we had to run our own errands."

"And all they have done, the brutes. Ah, if you had seen our lovely St. Petersburg—before. They have destroyed everything, everything. The Czar's handsome palace. They have pillaged it, defiled, ruined it."

I begin to feel uncomfortable. The previous day I had spent four hours at the Winter Palace. I saw the White Room, the Gold Room, and the Silver Room, all absolutely intact. I saw the imperial dining-room with its musical chandelier and its dull silver samovar. I saw the rooms of the Grand Duchesses, with their blue enamel Easter eggs and their ikons crowding one upon the other. I saw the dressing-room of the Czarina, with its faded pastels, her dressing-table set in a background of vaporous mousseline, her pin-cushions covered with Valenciennes lace. I saw the Czar's study, with its banal furniture, its tasteless seascapes hung on the walls, the books with infantile illustrations which he liked to skim, the ivory writing-set and jade objects, gifts of the Empress; and, on his large table, with the pens, pencils, and pads he used, the dull array of family photographs, from which emerges prominently one of the Czarina, inscribed: "Your ever loving Alix." I saw all this, and I report the fact timidly.

"It isn't true," the Baroness interrupts angrily.

"I can well understand your speaking so calmly, Madame," says the winsome little woman, sweetly speaking up to cover my error. "You are a Frenchwoman. They haven't tortured you."

"Whom do you mean by they: Lenin, Trotzky?"

"Lenin, Trotzky, who are they?"

Amazed, I ask: "What, haven't you——"

"Never. I've never allowed anyone to speak of them, never wanted to hear their names mentioned. I don't want to know who they are. I know they are a band of Jews, of murderers, of scoundrels, and that's enough for me."

"It's true," ventures the winsome little woman, "we refuse to read their infamous newspapers. We forbid those around us to tell us what is happening. They could only tell us of pillage and bloodshed, isn't it so? We succeeded in creating a little circle which nothing from outside penetrated: just we and an old servant. It was this secluded life and the comfort of prayer which pulled us through."

I ask them more questions. I hear that the schools, which I inspected for two months, have all been closed; that the theaters, which I attended almost every evening, have all been burned down; that Tverskaya Street in Moscow, where I spent the most peaceful days of my visit in Russia, was the scene of daily machine-gun slaughter. When, in order to draw them out, I mention historical facts, I see about me seven human beings, seven cultured women, more ignorant of the events of the past five years in Russia than the dullest peasant of France.

In the Driftway

As he has remarked before, the Drifter is opposed to generalizations, particularly about men and women. When he hears that men are strong and women are beautiful, he thinks of the Powerful Katinka and the Discus Thrower. He refuses either to hold with that large group, whose theories are admirably illustrated by Trust Company advertisements which tell a sad story of a man's fortune dissipated in five years because his wife was too inexperienced and ignorant of business, or with the smaller and more select group of which Mr. Mencken is the spokesman at present, whose contention is that women do not generally go into business because they recognize its essential triviality, but that when they do, they sweep the men off the boards. He is opposed to generalizations. And yet, as he passes St. Paul's churchyard to his lunch every day, he sees a curious sight: the spellbinders are there, the sweating soul-savers, beating the air in the name of Christianity or their particular version of it; and in the crowd which daily presses around the frenzied speaker he has, in two years, seen not more than at most three women amid the scores of men.

* * * * *

He will not pretend to interpret this scene. Let those who wish to draw deductions from external observation say that the absence of women at these gatherings proves that women are not curious or anxious for new experience, or that they are too sensible to waste time. Either of these things may be true, or neither. The spellbinders remain. Every day they begin their harangue in a moderately loud voice, urging the doctrine of salvation through publicity, and every day as their audience—their male audience—increases they become more heated: their collars are torn, their eyes roll, their accents are wild and shrill. The climax is usually reached when some member of the crowd volunteers to kneel with the preacher and be prayed over personally, and publicly. There is of course a certain passage which says: "And when thou prayest, thou shalt not be as the hypocrites are; for they love to pray standing . . . in the corners of the streets, that they may be seen of men. Verily I say unto you, They have their reward."

* * * * *

The Drifter is not one to begrudge them any reward they may get. For the world is made up of many persons doing different things. There is, for example, the gentleman who at this moment is engaged in walking backwards from the Atlantic Coast to San Francisco. He breezed into a little Virginia town the other day carrying a mirror in his hand to see his road with, and in the company of a friend who, although progressing in the usual way, was watching to see that he did not cheat. He explained that it was easy enough to make ten miles a day walking backwards; the strain was not on his legs but it was "mental": mostly because of the hundreds of persons daily who asked questions about his strange behavior. The Drifter is opposed to generalizations. Accordingly he will be willing to wager that in the crowds which lined the roadside and hurled interrogation or even derision at this crab-like creature there were fully as many women as men.

The Drifter.

Some Sins of Omission

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: How could Dreiser write an entire article on Indiana and never once mention the name of its greatest man, Eugene V. Debs?

San Francisco, October 12 Miriam Allen de Ford

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Mr. Dreiser's article on Indiana from an idealistic—if not realistic—standpoint could not have been improved upon. A politician would not have treated the State so kindly. The author's modesty in not mentioning the fact that his brother wrote the song "On the Banks of the Wabash" may be excused but not the careless omission of James Buchanan Elmore, the "Bard of Alamo," who wrote that immortal poem "The Monon Wreck."

"The Love of Liberty Brought Us Here"

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: "King's at the Mansion; and nobody ain't gwine to pull him from there!"

This is the slogan that has won for the Republic of Liberia a continuance of her laisser-aller policy, and has placed the Hon. Charles Dunbar King, for a further four years, definitely in the presidential chair.

But will Liberia be a land of Negro government for even that short period of time? Can America and Europe afford to allow a bankrupt people, with no healthy scheme of self-regeneration, to remain longer in the rut? No roads, no telegraphs, no railways, a postal-system that permits the President, at his own autocratic will, to intercept and destroy private correspondence, corruption on the bench, a depleted indigenous population, as the direct result of a cold-blooded policy of exporting "labor" (for the sake of head money) to other parts of West Africa, victimization of "white" residents, and everywhere a state of chicanery, deception, tyranny, and lying—this is Liberia.

Mr. King has held the reins since the beginning of 1920. If he is to hold them for another four years, little hope would seem to remain that the Liberian community can sustain self-government. For the republic is worse than bankrupt—it is consciously fraudulent!

The People's Party, with the Hon. S. G. Harmon at its head, has suffered an overwhelming defeat. I watched the election on the first day of last May—from the vantage-ground of the piazza at Grand Bassa, directly overlooking the polling booth. Early in the day there arrived in the town hordes of aborigines from the interior. These were naked, most of them, save for a narrow strip of cloth about the loins. They all carried thick sticks, as though prepared to contest their right to vote by weight of force. As they surged past the bungalow they were singing, in monotonous minor key, their local chanties. Gangs of this kind continued to appear throughout the morning. They were invariably led by one or the other of Mr. King's adherents. These Liberian conductors would see them safely past the window of the polling booth.

Representatives of the People's Party stood around the inclosure, sullenly acquiescent in the utilization of the "native" vote. They had not been apprised of this maneuver of Mr. King's party until toward the end of the period of preparation. They had—reluctantly—adopted the same method of voting; but it was too late for them to equalize the scale, especially as these natives' votes were all admittedly "bought."

The People's Party was out for a complete change in government policy. Mr. Harmon has behind him long business experience as a merchant. Mr. Faulkner, the proposed Vice-President, is a progressive American Negro. To him, and him alone, the capital (Monrovia) owes what little electric-power plant is to be found within the borders of the republic. Harmon and Faulkner, in partnership, might have saved the sinking ship. Meanwhile, Liberia is only a Gilbertian travesty of the boast "The Love of Liberty Brought Us Here!" For savage mobs, bribed by government money, marshaled by suborned officials, and fully determined to maintain the autocratic rule of Mr. King, may not be regarded as an honorable electorate.

In such circumstances we can only wait—and watch the march of events.

An Editorial Suggestion

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I am very much interested in The Nation and any other paper in the world which prints the truth and is not kept by some faction, whatever that faction may be. I believe in free speech, and when I say "free speech" I mean free with no "but I don't think they ought to print that" added to it and no "ifs" and "ands." I would like to see The Nation or some other liberal publication in the home of every American, and it is only a question, If they got it would they have intelligence enough to understand it, and if they had intelligence enough to understand it would they read it?

In this campaign of mine to put The Nation in the home of every American, and gradually the whole English-speaking world, there is certain information which I would like to have, and it is as follows:

1. A history of the liberal press in America from earliest times, and I suggest that Ludwig Lewisohn be commissioned to write it.

2. A story of the various writers of The Nation, just as Barron's Financial Weekly has stories about financiers every week. Let us start, for instance, with Mr. Villard, of whom we of the Great Unwashed know nothing. Tell the truth about him; tell how he has worked on The Nation and in the cause of free speech these many years without the payment of a single penny, but also, if he happens to be so broadminded on the Negro question, for instance, that he is narrow, tell that also. Write about Upton Sinclair and tell of his courage, but if you think he is a four-flusher, as I do, then include that also. Write about Ludwig Lewisohn and say that he is the greatest writer of the English language in America today and among its greatest thinkers, but if he wrote too pretty a story of Germany and a little too mean a story of America, then say so. Let this story of the various members of the staff of The Nation be like the stories of the States. Let them come one after another and let the writer of them be as bitter as he pleases. We want to know The Nation and its writers and its history. I want The Nation to prosper and have a circulation of 10,000,000. And when that happens, there'll be no Mussolini, Ku Klux Klan, Kaiser, Woodrow Wilson, Poincaré, Negro agitator, Volstead, Senator Lodge, or Commander Owsley of the American Legion.

A Worthy Candidate

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Being less of a "cook" than you are yourself, I am not at all prepared to talk on the subject of what is a typical American dinner. But in your suggestions you omitted corned beef and cabbage or, as it is getting to be known, "Jiggs Special." Am I mistaken about the nationality of this famous dish?

Ludwig Lewisohn

By LUDWIG LEWISOHN

I HAVE a very thoughtful friend who is always pointing out what seems to him a discrepancy in my activities. He says that I am a radical in my notions about life and a classicist in my notions about literature. My answer is that he is quite right, that I accept the imputation and glory in it, provided, of course, that I am permitted to define my terms.

A radical is one who insists that men shall live by the use of reason. (He means it. He does not stop using his reason when he is suddenly confronted by some particularly hoary and disreputable prejudice, taboo, superstition. It is at that point that he insists all the more on using his reason. Even at the risk of hurting some one's feelings. For by sparing this, for the moment, imaginary antagonist's feelings our radical gives that antagonist the continued privilege of spreading ruin and feeling righteous.)

A classicist is one who has accepted the teaching of the history of literature that the fundamental character of art-form is determined by the medium and the nature of man. (Art is communication. It must be intelligible. Therefore it must be articulate. There are irreducible minima of articulate intelligibility. Where these do not exist art has not yet begun to be. Gertrude Stein has not transcended the traditions of art. She has not yet reached them. Note: If terms and the things they stand for are to mean anything and we are to have poetry and prose then the fundamentum differentionis is the presence in poetry of a perceptible recurrence of similar rhythm-groups. . . . No, this is not pedantic. It is only exact.)

I am, then, a radical and a classicist. And, humble as I am, I am in amazingly good company—Plato, Euripides, Montaigne, Milton, Shelley, Goethe, Nietzsche. . . .

I knew from the beginning that I would please no one. While I was a university teacher my colleagues thought me dangerous, subversive, prone to defend the new, the revolutionary in life and letters. Now, on the other hand, my past is thrown up at me. Among dramatic critics I am thought of as academic. When I write fiction I am told that I am a licentious fellow. It is all inevitable enough; it is often amusing. There is nothing for me to do but serenely to accept the penalties of my position. For the plain truth is this: People in our time and country are not accustomed to have those who think know anything and they are even less accustomed to having one who knows try to think. The radicals have read nothing written before 1900; the university men vote the Republican ticket and walk humbly in the sight of their trustees and their God. . . .

So much for my central position which I felt it more or less of a duty to define. Now for the more strictly personal, indefinable, elusive things. For criticism, too, is art. . . .

It is borne in upon me more and more that I am something of a simpleton. I can grasp everything in Plato and in the second part of "Faust." What I read there corresponds to my experience of both the soul and the world. I cannot understand even one-half of what is written in, let me say, the prose of Mrs. Virginia Woolf or the verse of Mr. D. H. Lawrence. I keep wondering whether others do or whether they don't care. When I don't want to understand I listen to music. When I read literature I insist on understanding. Do my friends deceive themselves? Or do I deceive myself into thinking they deceive themselves in order to save my vanity as a man and a critic? At all events I am more and more tempted to flee from the works of the very subtle and the neo-mystical to works that I can understand. Mr. Lawrence's poetry can drive me as far back as Pope and Horace; the new mystics—including such great writers as Jacob Wassermann—as far back as Swift and Hume. It is hopeless. I can't get away from my combination—radical and classicist.

As a simple person I should possess the immunities of my temper and my limitations. I don't. I am often told that I am too intricate and profound. Or else that I ape intricacy and profundity. In brief, I am known here and there as a vicious "highbrow." And that is always, I observe, when I say things that seem obvious and plain and incontrovertible to me. Here are some of them:

If a book or a play isn't, in the ultimate sense, a work of art—isn't the translation of first-hand experience into creative form and vision—it isn't worth reviewing.

But if it is—then it is inviolable. The critic shouldn't tinker, advise, or, in the ordinary sense, find fault. For, in that ordinary sense, a work of art has no faults. Works of art differ as faces differ in beauty, intelligence, significance. But each human face is that face. Each authentic work of art is that work of art. It has grown in its author's mind and soul as a child grows in its mother's womb. I do not wish to reduce that truth to the absurd. Nearly every truth can be so reduced. But before every work of art, however humble, I try to be passive, to discover what the author willed to do, to project. . . . I don't talk past books or plays or poems. People are constantly talking past my own books. They establish no inner contact with them. They read as they run and then tell what they think, what they would have done, what they would have had me do. If I have one aim as a critic it is that no author shall accuse me of that carelessness, arrogance, impertinence. If I cannot get under the skin of a work of art I leave it alone.

If I err, if I do not always follow my own counsel perfectly, it is because, as time goes on, I care less and less for art in its more abstract forms and more and more for life. I am too preoccupied to be held by anything that approaches the decorative. It is the remediable moral suffering in the world that crowds my vision—the remediable moral suffering, remediable by a little hard thinking, a little tolerance, a little more goodness, a little less righteousness. If I write a criticism it is to further that supreme end; if I write a novel it is to further the same end. Is that bad criticism and bad art? It may be because I am a bad critic and a bad artist. It is not because my method and my aim are at fault. For the same aim and method were and are the aim and the method of Isaiah and Euripides, Hauptmann and Shaw. The greatest art has always sought to lessen the evils that are under the sun. But I am only I and this city is only this city and the great choices being taken from me I have a little choice left. If that little choice is indeed all I have I do not hesitate. Shall I be a fairly accomplished aesthete or a pamphleteer? A pamphleteer, by all means. Even a pamphleteer needn't write ill. Lessing was one, Swift another.

Personality and the Press

Some Newspapers and Newspapermen. By Oswald Garrison Villard. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

THERE has been in the last few years a notable increase in the number of books dealing with public opinion in its formation and expression. Obviously this is a result of the war, in which we had the experience of finding ourselves moving under the impulse of mass currents in a direction quite opposite to that prescribed by our national character and tradition, and to a destination which we could never, as individuals, have desired or chosen. We have become curious as to the processes of social psychology by which we were controlled. The war has educated public opinion into self-consciousness. Naturally a prime object of our consideration is the daily press.

Mr. Villard's book has a more modest aim than Mr. Lippmann set himself in his study of public opinion as an organism. It has a more limited objective than Mr. Upton Sinclair's attempt to psychoanalyze the press in "The Brass Check." "Some Newspapers and Newspapermen," as its title announces, is a study of the great dailies of the country in the light of their origin, history, environment, political and financial affiliations, and of the men who made and control them. It is a series of character sketches, in which each newspaper is a personality, expressed in the lineaments of its headlines and make-up and also in its behavior. It is a survey of elements of immense importance in our social life, and is comparable in scope to that study of municipalities made twenty years ago by Mr. Lincoln Steffens.

It is to be said at the outset that Mr. Villard is unusually well fitted for his task. He inherited the ownership of a great newspaper. No one ever questioned his journalistic ability or his high view of the responsibilities of the profession, to which he was willing to sacrifice material success. Since his retirement from the field he has occupied a favorable position for observation, and he has supplemented that observation with intelligent study of underlying conditions. It might be feared that Mr. Villard would write of his one-time rivals with bitterness or scorn. His judgments, it is true, are severe, but who will say that they are not just? Who will deny his indictment of the New York Times: "No journal has exceeded it in disseminating falsehoods, misrepresentations, and half truths during the unparalleled era of wholesale lying in which the whole world has lived since 1914"? Who can gainsay his comment on the Public Ledger: "The newspaper which dwells alongside the Saturday Evening Post, for all its excellent qualities and features, is without originality or distinction, and without a soul"? Yet the characters in Mr. Villard's drama are not all villains; and if he has no heroes he sees with admirable clearness the journalistic ideal and sets it forth with real eloquence.

In only a few matters, it seems to me, Mr. Villard's personal sympathy or animus has led him astray. The Minnesota Daily Star is a paper with 6,250 owners, and, as Mr. Villard says, "its success is of enormous moment to the cause of good journalism everywhere." Yet the 6,250 owners were powerless when "the dominating force," Thomas Van Lear, dismissed Herbert E. Gaston from the editorship. Mr. Villard attributes Mr. Gaston's departure to "a clash of personalities." It was more than that —it was a clash of principles. In the interest of the experiment of a newspaper with distributed ownership the whole story should have been told. Similarly the story of Fremont Older's departure from the San Francisco Bulletin and his engagement with Hearst's Call and Post is passed over. Clearly, Mr. Older felt that he could serve his public through the Hearst connection. Mr. Villard apparently disagrees, but he sheers away from the issue. This omission is the more striking when contrasted with the way in which he attacks Norman Hapgood for accepting service under Hearst, not as the editor of a daily, but as a writer and editor of a monthly. Mr. Villard's hatred of Hearst dates from the days when he, and other respectable editors, were trying to play the game according to rules which Hearst would not recognize. He sees Mr. Hapgood with sorrow rather than anger, as a lost leader. "Just for a handful of silver he left us." Nevertheless, from the absolutist point of view, Mr. Hearst looks a good deal like the others. From Mr. Villard's own pages it is permissible to conclude that Mr. Ochs and his Times are a greater and more subtle public danger than the Hearst press. And after all the sauce for Mr. Hapgood's goose is equally appropriate for Mr. Older's gander.

Undoubtedly the chief interest in Mr. Villard's book is in the narratives of successful struggle and the vivid portraits which lend to his subjects the interest of drama and character. He shows how practically all the great newspapers of this country owe their origin to some dominating individual, the New York Times to Ochs, the World to Pulitzer, the Herald to Bennett, the Chicago Tribune to Medill, the Louisville Courier-Journal to Watterson, the Kansas City Star to Nelson. Most of these, like the Italian condottieri, founded institutions which after their death continued to bear the impress of their personalities, and left power which under their successors tends to become diffused into a system. It is the glimpses which Mr.

Villard gives of this system which make his book significant as a social study.

One of the first generalizations which the reader will make is the fact that news is now a commodity, valuable primarily for its salability, selected according to what editors think is public taste, and set forth with window dressing, counter displays, and advertising as in all other merchandising. And as in merchandising, the demand creates the supply, and the supply in turn is made the occasion of an artificial demand. The public wants certain goods, including trash and scandal and lies; the newspaper exists as a vast machine for purveying these goods, and the appetite of the public, particularly for trash, etc., grows by what it feeds on. The peculiar menace of the newspaper is that it is in this respect like an insidious habit-producing drug. The newspaper owner has it in his power to extend indefinitely the appetite of the public for wares which he has a special concern in marketing. He can make his readers desire and expect atrocities from Germany, follies from Russia, conspiracy and treason in America; and when his reader is intoxicated with this stuff he can sell him a war or a Red Raid.

Mr. Villard is not bound to suggest a remedy for this state of things and he does not do so. He is sympathetic toward experiments in diffused or cooperative ownership, but his training has disposed him to think of the power of the press in personal terms, and his hope for the future is in an appeal to personal leadership. This gives significance in his closing chapters on E. L. Godkin and W. L. Garrison. One suggestion of social value is implicit in his pages. He notes frequently that great increase of circulation has been accompanied by a decline of influence in local affairs; that the opinions and advice of such papers as the New York Times and the Chicago Tribune and the Louisville Courier-Journal no longer are decisive in respect to matters within the scope of the personal knowledge of their readers. It is possible to hope that in respect to matters of national and international concern, where the falsifications of the press are most disastrous, the public may, by painful education, acquire the protection of this skepticism, and learn by the development of a kind of reader's sense to make automatically the adjustments necessary to distinguish between news and propaganda. In that case, we could afford to take the newspapers and newspapermen more lightly, and Mr. Villard could write about them more cheerfully than at present.

ROBERT MORSS LOVETT

Tales of Revolt

Robert Gregory. The History of a Little Soul. By John Owen. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.

Holiday. By Waldo Frank. Boni and Liveright. $2.

IN an article on the spirit of America after the war Mr. Stephen Graham discussed the growing regimentation and stratification of society in the United States. "America is more like England in this respect," he wrote. "Men begin to be in that state of life to which it has pleased God to call them." However, we have not yet reached that static state of business where the son inherits his father's calling as he comes into the "old man's" cast-off clothes. When our office boy says "my firm," he still unconsciously implies the possibility that he may own the business rather than the fact that the firm owns him.

Though named by others the white-collar slave, the American clerk is the least class-conscious of our multifariously unconscious working classes. He will admit no kinship with Robert Gregory, the English clerk in the *n*th generation, who seeks pathetically to leave the road that his father has traveled before him, who skids from side to side braving the danger of catastrophe only to end as he had begun—in the rut. Our clerk finds his kin in the thousand incarnations of the humble hero who lives happily after acquiring both his master's business and his comely daughter.

Yet "Robert Gregory" should be "required reading" for the American clerk, though one need not be a clerk to appreciate and understand the pain and the struggle recorded in it. The story wins one's sympathy immediately. Like all true art, it achieves the identification of subject and spectator. Moreover, Mr. Owen has been just as true to life as to art; he has written with knowledge as well as fervor. And if this knowledge has forced him to emphasize the drab and the sordid, this fervor has enabled him to rescue the commonplace from dulness and ugliness. Robert's revolt animates even his incompetence and makes tragedy of his dramatic failure.

Waldo Frank writes the tale of another futile revolt from the only inescapable social position in American life, that of the Negro in the South. His original contribution to the recent variations on this theme lies in showing the white man—in this case the white woman—as helpless a slave to his place in the social structure as the black and equally unable to step across the border line. A far greater contribution is the unforgettable symphony of "Niggertown," full of passion and pain.

Despite their similarity in thematic material, these books are as far apart in conception and style as it is possible for two novels to be. Mr. Owen writes in the best manner of the traditional form for fiction; Mr. Frank continues to lead the American neoterics in poetry and power of expression. The difference in their work is the difference between trouvère and troubadour. The first is an historian of social customs; the other a minstrel of personal sentiments. "Holiday" is more dramatic than "Robert Gregory" but less honest; it is more elusive but less alive. In Mr. Frank's novel the subject has its apotheosis in sex; Mr. Owen uses sex as one of many illustrations.

It is not my purpose to decide in favor of one method and against the other, but it is impossible to ignore the fact that for all its beauty and worth, "Holiday" is simply a lyrical outburst, whereas "Robert Gregory" is a definitive study of man and manners. Waldo Frank, too, is concerned with men and women but his way of characterizing them is like Shelley's description of the lark, which the game warden failed to recognize.

JOHAN J. SMERTENKO

The World We Want

Prospects of Industrial Civilization. By Bertrand and Dora Russell. The Century Company. $2.

BOOKS in which Bertrand Russell has a hand—other than his popularly incomprehensible mathematical treatises—have an engaging childlike quality. His imagination roams the universe with light-footed daring. His personal preferences are naively set forth. His conclusions result from brilliant improvisation, sometimes resting on detailed knowledge of his premises, but more often arising merely from the broadest of impressions, and embodying amusing simplifications of the facts. The consequence is two-fold: inspired illuminations of human problems akin to the wisdom proceeding from the mouths of babes and sucklings, and equally stimulating but fantastic departures from reality.

The present book consists of two parts, the first an analysis of the world's present troubles, and the second an attempt to define and discover the approaches to a better social order.

The authors believe that the two chief disintegrating influences in the modern world are the conflicts leading to international war inherent in nationalism, and the conflicts between exploiter and exploited inherent in industrialism. Both must be allayed not merely to produce a decent world, but to avoid universal catastrophe. The interactions of these two forces are producing a situation in which the catastrophe draws ever closer. What chance is there of avoiding it? No chance, if both or either of the conflicts is to come to a violent issue everywhere in the world, since the struggle incident to the victory of either side would blast an abyss under both. The authors are not so sanguine as to hope for complete escape from violence. But they do, by an intricate and bold course of reasoning, conclude that nationalistic struggles may come to an end by the creation of a few great self-sufficient land empires capable of defense but unready for attack, and that a new economic order, though prevented by violence or unfavorable conditions everywhere else in the world, may arrive opportunely in the United States with a minimum of bloodshed.

The second part of the book is less closely knit. It contains brilliant observations on the proper test for a desirable social order, and attempts to apply the test to such things as moral standards, sources and distribution of power, education, and economic organization. It will be no surprise to Mr. Russell's readers to discover that the authors find their criteria in their conception of the good type of man, and that they want a society not unduly regimented, in which material gain, competition, and work are subordinated to health, friendship, aesthetic and intellectual pursuits, and leisure.

Few civilized persons will dispute the broad assumptions and desires of such delightful authors. But as a definite contribution to detailed analysis and solution of the world's problems, the book has no more authority, and no more appositeness, than would naturally arise from the random speculation of such intelligent and sympathetic amateurs. The authors seem to be blind to the part which must be played by the newer type of human science, if man is to control his fate. Exact and detailed knowledge, combined with carefully controlled experiments, are as necessary for ordered human relationships as they are for engineering and medicine. The authors object to the valuation of science for its utilitarian purposes rather than for the sake of pure knowledge. In this attitude they are doubtless thinking of the physical sciences, whose immense contribution to material progress has been paralleled by so little contribution to happiness. But the way out, I believe, lies not in the substitution of an absolutist philosophy for the pragmatic, but in the extension of the pragmatic test to the sciences underlying human behavior and organization. It is precisely because economists and psychologists have in the past been satisfied with introspective methods and closed systems of "natural law" rather than with quantitative investigations of data and experimental testing of results that we do not yet know how to make the kind of world we want, though we do know how to build skyscrapers and automobiles.

GEORGE SOULE

A Hamlet in Politics

The Life of Lord Rosebery. By E. T. Raymond. George H. Doran Company. $3.

FOR more than a generation after the establishment of the new political order in Japan the old Shogun still lived. Change rapidly succeeded change in the process of modernizing the country's institutions, while the once supreme ruler watched everything from a position of obscure retirement as a private citizen, no one even suggesting that his counsel or cooperation would be of any national service. Very similar has been the situation of Lord Rosebery for many a long year. When there have been government defeats or other acute crises in British politics, in all the excited canvassing of ministerial changes the name of one of the most highly gifted of former premiers has never been so much as mentioned. Politically he has been as dead as any eighteenth-century statesman entombed in Westminster Abbey. It is significant that not only in recording the incidents of Lord Rosebery's life but in depicting his personal traits the present biographer writes everywhere not "he is" but "he was."

The most satisfactory explanation available both of the rise of Lord Rosebery and of his decline and fall will be found in Mr. Raymond's brilliant biography. A reader who knew nothing and cared nothing about British politics might easily find this book of absorbing interest merely as a psychological study. It analyzes, sympathetically and yet unsparingly, one of the most fascinating characters in the public life of modern times, and sets forth with admirable clearness the causes both of Lord Rosebery's initial successes and of the ultimate futility of his disappointing career. Mr. Raymond shows how the circumstances of his birth and training contributed to make him what he became; how, for instance, his Scotticism made it difficult for him to fit precisely into any English scheme of things; how his being "sent down" from Oxford deprived him of his last chance of getting the stimulus of competition in spheres where his caste could not help him; how the handicap of his early succession to a peerage caused him to miss the discipline of the wholesome day-by-day clash with men of various classes and temperaments in the House of Commons, as well as of the constant compulsion to pull his full weight in the political game; and how his wealth, his aristocratic lineage, and his great natural endowment as an orator all conspired to make of him a spoiled favorite of fortune.

But these things come far short of telling the whole story. "There is no single clue," writes the biographer, "to the mystery of Lord Rosebery, with his spasmodic brilliances, his strange lethargies, his sudden strengths, his unexpected weaknesses." Perhaps Mr. Raymond brings us nearest to a single explanatory formula when he speaks of the constant incompatibility between Lord Rosebery's mind and his temperament. His imagination was seized by the harsher and more rugged virtues—such as independence, self-sufficiency, frugality, tenacity—but in practice he was very unlike the stoic hero he idealized. He had to reconcile an aristocratic temper with a democratic creed, and as time went on the problem became more and more difficult until at last his early enthusiasms faded away. His biographer shrewdly remarks that Lord Rosebery was always the eloquent exponent of the views of others rather than himself an originator, and that the relative tameness of the concluding phases of his career may be partly due to the absence of men big enough to furnish him with the appropriate stimulus.

In this book, as in its predecessors on the same shelf, Mr. Raymond shows himself a master of the art of putting things. In addressing the House of Lords Lord Rosebery "adopted the tone of a very consciously sane chaplain addressing the inmates of a home for imbeciles." His Chesterfield speech "smacked rather of the epitaph than of the manifesto." With him, as with most men, "cynicism was only a form of going into black for a departed self." And the tenor of the narrative is sometimes quite helpfully broken by passages in which Mr. Raymond expresses his own opinions on some relevant topic. He explains, for instance, in three illuminating pages, why it is a mistake to speak of London as "an imperial city"; he discusses the characteristic differences between aristocrats and middle-class men as cabinet ministers; and, in an excellent and well-balanced criticism of imperialism, he offers some suggestive reflections on the "lesser" and the "larger" patriotism.

Scramble

IN spite of the tumult and the shouting the season is, so far, an uninteresting one. We are at its very height and there are just two plays in which the mind can take solid satisfaction —"Windows" and "Tarnish." The visit to these shores of famous players or famous organizations of players does not, after all, furnish one with that ultimate satisfaction which the theater has to offer—a fresh or vigorous or beautiful projection of some part of that natural and inherent struggle and crisis which is the essence "of man, of nature, and of human life."

Hence I am pleased, but pleased quite without enthusiasm, by Mr. Walter Hampden's spirited revival of "Cyrano de Bergerac" at the National Theater. The play in its original tongue has infinite verve and sparkle and even poetic eloquence of a kind. Stripped of that it becomes a thing of somewhat deliberate if gallant posturing and can neither enlarge the mind nor touch the heart.

What is true of "Cyrano de Bergerac" is far more true, of course, of "The Swan," by Ferenc Molnar (Cort Theater). Molnar knows more of mediatized or semi-mediatized princelings than either Anthony Hope or George Barr McCutcheon ever did. Frequently in the first act and more sporadically throughout he has shrewd observations upon these pathetic and futile people. But the play, though it may deserve a slightly better fate, is played both out of and to the Zenda-Graustark mood and caters partly to tinsel romanticism, partly to the undying snob in the soul of man. The production and the acting are both hopelessly sweet.

The root of the matter is in none of these things. It is in "The Shame Woman," by Miss Lula Vollmer, the author of "Sun Up." As in "Sun Up" so in "The Shame Woman" the fable cracks and crumbles at a definite point. The death of Lily is simply incredible. We know perfectly well that the girl didn't die, nor is her death a signal for the withdrawal of the action into a region of the symbolic. Nevertheless "The Shame Woman" marks an advance over "Sun Up" in this respect, that the break in the action is not the intellectual suicide of the fable. The story, proceeding straight from the characters of the people, is not altered in its inner character and thus, especially with the fine example of Mr. Gilbert Emery before us, I hope that, in her third play, Miss Vollmer will quite have got ever the besetting vice of the young American dramatist—an ogreish appetite for his own ideas and words.

The dramatic texture of "The Shame Woman" is quite on a level with that of "Sun Up." Again Miss Vollmer's presentation of folk life is rich and authentic; again she tells us what we are most eager to know—the inner truth of human lives. Again we see exemplified the recurrent experience that art most deeply rooted in a given soil has the best chance of attaining a universality of interest. There is no performance in the production of "The Shame Woman" quite equal to the superb and now famous one of Miss Lucille La Verne in "Sun Up." But that of Miss Florence Rittenhouse as Lize Burns is not far below it. It is very well to say that acting is not a mimetic art. In one sense that is true enough. So soon, however, as we understand the nature of imitation in all art this remark—now made with increasing frequency—darkens counsel. Acting is not immediate imitation. The actor must absorb the character from nature and the dramatist's words and then recreate that character through the medium of his art. All art, in brief, works through a definite medium. But nature remains model and foundation, and art is most perfect when its medium becomes the vehicle of an ultimate impression which is nature "animated," concentrated, heightened, if you will, but nature still. And I know of no two examples of recent acting that illustrate this point quite as well as the performances of Miss La Verne and Miss Rittenhouse in these two folk-plays of the North Carolina mountains.

It is also illustrated, of course, by the performance of Signora Duse in "Ghosts." Here, as Mrs. Alving, her art is quite naturalistic, that is to say, unfeignedly mimetic in the proper sense. And as such it leaves nothing to be desired. I am bound to confess, however, that the irremediably Italian atmosphere of the entire performance—Pastor Manders was every inch a priest of the Latin church—stood between me and the tragic clarity of "Ghosts" and that I saw beyond the gestures and heard beyond the moans of Mrs. Alving that infinitely melancholy figure, that plangent cry with which, her eyes upon the sea, Eleonora Duse expressed the grace and tragic charm of her personality and character.

The Hunger Strike in Ireland

By Æ

RECENT history in Ireland will do nothing to soften that bitter Irish humor which is an evolutionary product, and which stimulates without sweetening our lives. A humor without bitterness playing on politics and personalities might have saved many souls from becoming immovable images of pride. Nothing is more destructive of rigid mentality and emotional obsessions than laughter.

Failing that dissolving laughter we can only treat the problem of the hunger strikers seriously. It is a policy which, like the abandoned policy of civil war, occurs to people who do not think, and who have only an abnormal and inherited capacity for suffering. It is no more an intellectual policy than killing other people is an intellectual policy. The courage required for both may be admitted, but neither by killing people or wounding their feelings are they convinced that those who do these things to them are in the right. The aim of all discussion should be to allure people by reason, by the exposition of noble and intellectual images of society, so that of their own free will they will be convinced. There is danger, too, in a country if political groups, determined to make their existence felt, go on from one sensational policy to another, that those who endure perpetual economic and moral suffering brought on by these sensational policies will get callous, and at last as cold as a stone and incapable of giving its due of tears or sympathy to any tragic event in society.

We all know how profoundly in childhood we were moved when first in our sheltered lives we heard of crime or death, but as we grew older and read continuously of murders, earthquakes, famines, and other sensational happenings we lost sensitiveness. We say how shocking, but really we are not shocked. We have become insensitive through over-sensation. At the beginning of the European War the first reports of thousands slain in a day moved every heart. After three years of international murder hardly any except those whose fathers, brothers, husbands, or sons were in the lists of dead or wounded read the news with an extra beating of the heart. They had no feeling left. Those who come to Ireland with fresh hearts and unsquandered emotions, and who read our daily papers, find in them hardly a trace of humanity for any misfortune here or elsewhere. We appear almost a heartless people. We are not so naturally. We have squandered our emotions.

We do not know what the Free State Government may do in regard to this hunger strike. But this we feel sure, that if these desperate gambles for victory go on, not merely will prisoners suffer pain and perhaps death, but the heart of Ireland may cease for a generation to beat for any generous cause. The children of the state may fester in slums, the workers be sweated, our public life may be mean and corrupt, but men will not react from it.

To most European peoples we in Ireland appear to have suffered but little in a decade in which they were altogether wretched. In many countries armies have trampled over the fields, men have been killed, not in hundreds, as here, but in tens of thousands or hundreds of thousands, and many also have perished of famine. They look without pity on our self-inflicted tragedies, upon our own wrecking and burning of our own buildings, while, with them, cities were made dust-heaps by alien enemies; upon our self-starvation while they were hungry because they could not get enough to eat.

We are not now protesting against Republicanism, which as a political ideal might, if any had the imagination, be made alluring to all of us. We are protesting against the waste of national feeling, the squandering of national emotion over circumstance which we sometimes feel has been engineered on purpose. Oh, we do not doubt there were brutalities. They are inevitable when physical force is resorted to in a country. There have been crimes on both sides. But what is to be gained by the continued and passionate imputation to whole parties of the villainies of the scum on either side? If this continues our national life will be arid as a sandy desert. What poor leadership, too, is this policy if the object was the early release of prisoners! The whole country was grateful when it learned there was to be no further internal or external conflict. The honor of the Republican Party was involved in adherence to this policy. Few people in Ireland wished to keep thousands of their own countrymen in prison if there was no fear of further conflict. The demand for release would have been overpowering from all sections in the Free State, as hardly any even of its sternest partisans desired their countrymen to be in prison once the menace of civil war was removed. Within a few weeks in all probability after the declaration that conflict was over most of the prisoners would have been at their homes. But the declaration of peace was coupled with a hunger strike of unprecedented dimensions for the immediate release of all prisoners. But will this hunger strike hasten release? Would any government in the world allow itself to be humiliated by orders given in this fashion? It is certain the Free State Government cannot let them all die. But what unnecessary suffering to inflict on men! What torture of their relatives! What intensifying of hatred on one side and contempt on the other!

We were once a gay, hardy, and natural folk, mistrusting those who fed overmuch on tragic emotions. Let us hope this will be the last flare-up of unreason, for what Ireland needs is thought. We believe there is the quickest natural mentality here, but so uneducated and so ill informed that it does more harm than good to the possessor of it. Let us concentrate on education, and one of the most brilliant people in Europe may inhabit this island in a quarter of a century.

With regard to the prisoners, we think the Government should accept the declaration of the Ard-Fheis that there would be no more internal or external conflict and release them. If there are any who still nourish thoughts of fighting, the country will soon make it clear to them that they will get no sympathy. If any do not take the hint and start afresh, for their future fate if captured there will be neither sigh nor song. The only way to win Ireland over to Republicanism is to exhibit a higher culture, a better character, a finer intellect, a more practical economic sense than the upholders of the present Constitution show. The more they exhibit this superiority the better for their cause. The more they rely merely on their capacity for suffering the more will people be callous and their hearts be turned away.

The Republican Plea

THE hunger strike of the Irish Republican prisoners begun on October 14 has occasioned much comment in Ireland and the United States. The position of even the more liberal supporters of the Free State is one of bitter opposition to this policy; on another page we print an article by George W. Russell (Æ) expressing this view. The Republican attitude is given in the documents appearing below.

"FREEDOM OR THE GRAVE"

A flier, with this head, freely distributed and giving the story of the hunger strike from a Republican point of view, reads as follows:

THE FINAL HUNGER STRIKE

Mountjoy.

On Sunday, the 14th of October, a general hunger strike was declared by the political prisoners at present detained in Mountjoy jail. This hunger strike will be the final hunger strike to take place in this jail as long as the men are in it, for it will come to an end in a way that will preclude a repetition of such a fight—in victory and release, or in the death of the prisoners.

The Reason.

A brief recapitulation of the incidents of the present struggle makes it evident that the men had no other option than to take this extreme step—the only alternative being in their own words "slow death."

The treatment and conditions were not at any time of a nature to preclude protest and attack by the prisoners. But at no time did the treatment meted out to the men reach a height of systematized cruelty such as it had reached at the date of this strike. Nor, more important still, did it resolve itself into an attempt to reduce the prisoners to the level of common criminals. That was the position when on Sunday the 14th the men, hopeless of gaining any permanent redress, declared their resolve to "achieve freedom or the grave." Their manifesto has been printed elsewhere, has been distributed to every paper in Ireland, and has been published in the Republican press. In it they amply justify their action. They acknowledge that they fully realize the terrible sufferings which await them in their trial, but they also recount what they have been forced to undergo at the hands of their jailers, and declare that with no assurance that any redress will be permanent, they have no option but to adopt the final weapon of passive resistance—hunger strike.

Manacled for Fourteen Days.

The hunger and thirst strike of Dan Breen, T.D., served to open the eyes of the public, in a degree, to the conditions which must have forced such a frightful course on any man. After his release, instead of becoming any better, conditions became far worse, and on the return of the twelve men temporarily removed to Arbour Hill, they found things in a state which only suggests a parallel in the treatment meted out by his jailers to O'Donovan Rossa. Men were being deprived of all recreation, letters, and parcels, and being driven in to their cells at 7 p. m. by rifle fire. They were being raided and terrorized at all hours of the day and night. Prisoners in the basement were manacled for over a fortnight—scantily clad. Hospital patients were being deprived of all exercise and other facilities, and sent to the wings when they took down the door locked on them. Nine men in Wing D—a "punishment wing"—had already threatened a hunger and thirst strike if their treatment continued, but matters came to a head on Saturday night, October the 13th, when the prisoners issued their manifesto and embarked on the strike.

Knowing what the Free State party has shown itself capable of in many fields of cruelty, there can be no doubts as to what this strike is going to mean to the men—what it is in fact already forcing them to endure. In their present weak condition, due to the confinement and brutal treatment of the past month, with winter at its worst in a fortnight's time, with inadequate clothing, no parcels, no mental or bodily comfort of any sort whatsoever, their agonies must be at the present moment indescribable. Hunger strikes of the past—with a sympathetic populace, a church anxious and solicitous—will fade into insignificance before this terrible fight by men cruelly treated, cold, unclothed, and delicate.

Yet, they have had no option. The cause of their imprisonment disappeared six months ago with the cessation of war. The Free State Party boasts of their success in locking up all the "dangerous characters" of the country. Yet the deeds of violence which have characterized these two years have not abated a jot since the number of prisoners mounted from zero to thirteen thousand. Excuse might be made for the inflamed passions of men during hostilities, but the conditions in Mountjoy have never been as bad as they now are, nor did the supporters of the present regime ever encourage such conditions during hostilities by a refusal to recognize the status of prisoners. Fear of renewed fighting might have been pleaded in June, but the discipline which has been proof against the goads of these past six months is the most ample seal to the guaranty of Eamonn De Valera that fighting came definitely to an end in May, 1923.

Our Peace and Theirs.

These men in Mountjoy and their fellows throughout Ireland who will probably follow their example without delay, are acknowledged (assuredly so if any of them should die) as men fighting for their honest convictions. Their fellow-countrymen at liberty are proving by their regard for the welfare, prosperity, and culture of their country that they are actuated by unselfish patriotism—yet 13,000 men and some hundreds of girls are forced to the extreme step of self-immolation that they may be permitted to work for the regeneration of their country, the restoration of its honor, and the revival of its ancient civilization.

The subversion of all justice in this will react in the confusion, not alone of those who have caused it, but those who have permitted it to be. If deeds could prove it, it has been amply proved that tyranny is barren in fruit but as bursting with evil results as plague.

The death of a single one of these prisoners will be an added sting to its lash, but their speedy release may be the turning-point of our internal troubles and the signal for a reversion to the happier days of national unity and self-respect.

A REPUBLICAN DENIAL

On Wednesday, October 31, the following messages by code and cable were received from Dublin, London, and Paris by J. J. O'Kelly, Irish Republican representative in New York, denying the recently published statements that many of the 15,000 Irish prisoners on hunger strike have abandoned their fast:

Acting President Rutledge cables: "President De Valera was ordered by Cabinet not to hunger strike. No communication from him since. But it is known that he is closely confined with guard of officers and firing squad. Please deny as an absolute fabrication the statement that Austin Stack was forty-eight hours late in starting strike. He acually has led the strike, as he did in Belfast six years ago. The allegation that pastilles and bread were found on the prisoners is a pure invention of the same type as was used against Terence MacSwiney. The truth is that no parcels whatever—even purgatives or linen—have been allowed into the jails for a month."

Mayor O'Callaghan cables: "Numerous municipal and public boards have announced their decision to cease functioning until the prisoners are released. Free State terribly perturbed and feverishly spreading false statements alleging abandonment of strike to break men's morale. Exhausted prisoners are cruelly transferred to distant jails and scattered to facilitate the dissemination of lies among them. A typical case is: Prisoners after seven days' fast were dragged from cells in Mountjoy at 5 in the morning in bitter cold, left handcuffed in the yard without water until 5 in the evening, kept in lorries until 7, huddled in railway terminus till 8, and after three hours further detention in Currage Railway Station forced to march handcuffed after midnight a distance of four miles to the notorious Tintown Camp.

"Men sinking, but morale magnificent. No thought whatever of abandoning strike. 'Freedom or the Grave' is the slogan. We must win!"

The Military Heel

DURING the last ten days of April, 1923, the acting mayor of the city of Bonn in the Rhineland was asked to call upon the district delegate of the Interallied Rhineland Commission. He was informed that the military authorities needed furnishings for the families of about 200 railway officials and that the municipal administration of Bonn should deliver these furnishings. The mayor replied that the municipal administration did not have the furnishings and had no money with which to purchase them. He was then informed that they would be requisitioned in any case. At 5:45 a.m. on May 5 the following letter was delivered to him:

INTERALLIED RHINELAND COMMISSION
DISTRICT OF BONN
No. 2259, 4 f Bonn, May 4, 1923
From: Lieutenant Bessy de Boissy, District Delegate of the Interallied Rhineland Commission.
To: The Mayor of Bonn.
Subject: Apartments for French Railway Personnel.

MR. MAYOR: I have the honor of informing you that the military authorities find themselves compelled to obtain by requisition apartments for the French officials who are to assure railway traffic in Bonn. This measure becomes necessary because the German authorities (especially the Reichsvermögensamt) have not taken the necessary steps to obtain these apartments.

The process will begin on Saturday, May 5, at six o'clock in the morning. Approximately 180 families are concerned. The 180 families must give up their apartments entirely and leave household furniture, household linen, kitchen utensils, china, and so on. They will have the right to take with them only their personal clothing, jewelry, papers, and stocks and bonds.

They are to be given four hours in which to make their preparations. It will then be your duty to find other dwellings for them.

You will instruct the municipal police to maintain order in the city and not to permit any manifestation or the formation of crowds. The police will be held responsible for any outbreak which it does not immediately put down.

Permit me, Mr. Mayor, to express my high respects.

BESSY DE BOISSY

The Nation is informed from sources which it is for obvious reasons not free to reveal that the requisition began promptly fifteen minutes after this letter had been handed to the mayor. A number of groups of ten or fifteen soldiers each accompanied by an official entered the houses, informed the families that they must leave within four hours, left a small military post with the family, and then proceeded elsewhere. The requisitioning process lasted through Saturday and part of Sunday. Later, barracks were erected in various parts of the city in order to shelter the families which had been forced to live in the streets.

HIRAM JOHNSON has tossed his hat into the ring, but somehow none of the ringside spectators seem excited about it. Most of them probably thought that the hat had been lying in the ring lo, these many years. Almost every speech which the Senator from California has made in the last eight or ten years has been rather in the way of practice at presidential hat-tossing. Ten years ago, however, Hiram Johnson stood out as a fighting progressive with a record of real wrestling-matches with the Southern Pacific Railroad Company. Today he seems merely the familiar politician who ducked the Newberry issue, raised his voice in a piteous plea for protection for California lemons, and took his full share of patronage under the Harding Administration—from the same "materialist, stolid, and stubborn men" in whom he now suddenly discovers such "irreconcilable differences." Meanwhile a recent convert to California, William Gibbs McAdoo, has admitted to the waiting world that he is a candidate for the Democratic nomination. Mr. McAdoo has not the Senator's oratorical gifts, but he has the merit of meeting some issues. We do not agree with him about the bonus, but we know where he stands; and we like his consistent defense of the war-time policy of government control of the railroads. Unfortunately he has hitherto avoided the issue of the Klan, and he cannot be unaware that in the South he is coming to be generally regarded as the Ku Klux Klan's candidate.

GERMANY'S paper marks now number quintillions. If the presses do not stop soon the arithmeticians may have to invent a word for a million decillions. Meanwhile, the Entente has been saved again. News of an imminent break between England and France sent the pound sterling and the franc tumbling down on the stock market, and news of the patched-up peace brought a partial recovery. If the bankers were as wise as fable makes them we suspect that their reaction would have been precisely the contrary. These patched-up peaces postpone a real European settlement. A break between England and France might cause more temporary chaos, but continuance in the policy of cowardly compromises will achieve no more in the future than it has in the past. The latest compromise is an absurd face-saver, like its predecessors. England will join in a sharp warning note to the German Government reprimanding it for refusing to promise protection to Allied control officers in regions where it has no control; and France agrees to omit mention of specific sanctions in case of refusal. Europe is not helped by such fear of facing the music. The demand to expel the ex-Crown Prince is dropped, France apparently being satisfied by the "discovery" of the text of his abdication. Economic peace in the Ruhr seems farther off than ever. The industrialists finally refused to sign the ignominious terms on which we commented in an editorial, Poincaré's Bargain, two weeks ago (the French dispatches reporting agreement were mistaken) and accordingly more tens of thousands of Ruhr workingmen are thrown into idleness and utter want.

ONE reason why Congress has less excuse this winter than ever for listening to the advocate of a soldiers' bonus is that in the five years since the armistice various States have done so much that a national dole would be a duplication in the case of more than half of our ex-service men. The American public has already imposed on itself a burden of $380,600,000 in the way of State bonuses which, added to the $270,000,000 which the Federal Government paid when the men were discharged, makes a total of $650,600,000. This is more than any of our Allies have paid, including those that mobilized much larger armies. France, for instance, has paid $373,371,150, and Great Britain $275,910,446. A statement by the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, which compiled these figures, shows that nineteen of our States have either paid or authorized a bonus. These States embrace most of the more populous ones and claim 2,348,655 of the total 4,582,393 men whom America mobilized for the World War. It looks as if we had had bonus legislation enough.

IF Secretary Mellon sincerely wants to know how to reduce tax burdens, we suggest that he take a trip to Minnesota and observe the methods of the Oliver Iron Mining Company. This company, which is a subsidiary of the Steel Trust, has long been in controversy with the State over a tax levy of $4,340,000. After a prolonged legal battle the courts recently decided that the company owed this sum and must pay it. But in the meantime the failure of the company to pay its assessment had subjected it to penalties amounting to $1,797,000. According to the Minneapolis Labor Review, the court decision carried no provision for the remission of these penalties, but executives in Governor Preus's administrative family—impressed with the hardships of the Steel Trust—arranged that if the tax itself was kindly paid the penalties would be thoughtfully forgiven. One way to save taxes is to be so poor that there's nothing to assess; another method is to be so prudent as to invest your earnings in tax-exempt securities; best of all is to be a Steel Trust.

LOTHAR WITZKI, said to be the only German spy captured, tried, and convicted as such in the United States, was released from Leavenworth Prison by order of President Coolidge on November 21. Other Germans convicted for acts of sabotage were released long ago. The men who sold the army leaky raincoats and paper shoes went scot-free. The men who squandered the nation's millions while ex-service men waited for the promised help have weathered a congressional hearing without even seeing the inside of a police station. But when the iron gates closed behind Lothar Witzki they left thirty-two brave men inside, convicted in 1917 because they dared to speak the truth as God gave them to see it, men who believed the Constitution of the United States meant what it said—our American political prisoners. We release spies and saboteurs and we let our profiteers go unscathed, but men with the courage of unpopular opinions we put in jail and leave there. President Coolidge knows that these men are innocent of crime; if they should have to pass their seventh Christmas in prison cells it would be only because the President feared the political effect of pardon.

IF Comptroller Craig of the city of New York serves, as the United States Supreme Court has ruled he must, a sentence of sixty days in jail for contempt, we hope the public will not be satisfied with any futile manifestations of sympathy toward him personally. The proposal to ask Congress to pass a law giving the President the power of pardon in contempt cases is also a wrong way to attack this evil. For there is an evil and it ought to be attacked. The use by judges of their power to punish for contempt of court promises presently to become as much of a scandal as their exercise of the injunction and to transform our tribunals into public nuisances. The power cuts directly into the institution of trial by jury, and is a relic of the divine right of kings that has survived from absolutist days along with other less harmful trumpery in our judicial system. There are two kinds of contempt: that committed in court and that committed outside. For the former there is a slender argument, although hundreds of hearings are held successfully in this country every year by legislative or other official bodies having no such power. For contempt outside of court, as in the case of Mr. Craig, there is no reason whatever why the case should not go before a jury. The outrage of allowing a judge to be the arbiter is the more acute because he is called upon to decide a case affecting himself, in which it is almost impossible to be impartial. As well allow the victim of a hold-up to try, convict, and sentence his attacker.

THE Methodists are to be congratulated. Despite the storm of abuse heaped upon Bishop Blake and his colleagues, who had undertaken to raise funds to help the Living Church in Soviet Russia, the Board of Bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church has unanimously voted its thanks to Bishop Blake, who went to Moscow, and has authorized Bishop Nuelsen, whose province is Germany, to cooperate with the soviet church. The bishops passed no judgment upon the Soviet Government; that is not their province, and unlike Bishop Manning of the Protestant Episcopal Church, who has taken his stand with the Czarist faction in the Russian church in New York City, these bishops understand their province. Some of the newspapers think it extraordinary that the bishops should encourage friendly relations with Russia before the United States Government has recognized the Russian Government. It seems to us, even after the disheartening experience of the war, highly appropriate that a Christian body should refuse to bound its sympathy by political or economic frontiers.

B. K. WHEELER, Senator-elect from Montana, has in a few crisp sentences disposed of the National Civic Federation, which has been snorting with pain because of the declarations of Mr. Wheeler and other recent visitors to Russia in favor of recognition of the Soviet Government by the United States. The federation's letter, signed by its president, Alton B. Parker, says that the Soviet "is promoting Communism and revolutionism in the United States at this time as it was doing while you were its guest in Moscow," and that recognition "would carry with it the establishment of Soviet consulates here which, as shown by experience in other countries, become nothing more than centers for Communist propaganda, including the promotion of atheism." To this Mr. Wheeler replied in part:

> The above conclusions are doubtless based on the same kind of information that induced you to make the statement that I was "a guest of the Soviet Government in Moscow." . . . I am absolutely convinced that the Russian Government, as such, is not promoting Communism and revolution in the United States, nor is it carrying on a propaganda for atheism. . . . Doubtless the Socialist, the Communist, and other schools of economic thought are doing whatever they can to convince the world that their theories are right. But why should we fear their arguments? Are we afraid that the communistic program is so attractive and convincing that it will appeal to the American mind? . . . I do not fear they [the Americans] will adopt the theories of Communism unless it be thoroughly proved to them that a better system of government is presented than the one our fathers founded something over a hundred years ago.

This is a good answer and sound Americanism; but it has not received much publicity in the newspapers that carried most extensively the federation's fulminations.

THE explanation that his physicians have advised him to avoid great exertions until after Christmas does not adequately account for Lord Robert Cecil's removal to the House of Lords. There must be reasons not officially proclaimed for his willingness to take a final farewell of the Commons. Whatever else it may mean, his decision indicates presumably a definite renunciation of the prospect, so ardently cherished by many of his admirers, of his eventually becoming the leader of the Liberal Party. His inherited Conservatism has so often been modified by a Liberal outlook that there has seemed nothing improbable in the hope that, like Gladstone, he might in some crisis come over wholeheartedly and avowedly to the progressive side. But everyone recognizes that in these days it would no longer be possible to carry on a Liberal administration with a prime minister from the Upper House. As a Conservative, however, of a rarely reasonable and unfashionable type, the statesman whom we have hitherto known as Lord Robert Cecil may exert for many years, under his new title yet to be announced, a wholesome influence among the peers. He is by no means the sort of man who takes color from his surroundings, and the conventional toryism of his new environment may be expected, if anything, to stimulate the strong individuality and democracy of his character.

GOVERNOR WALTON, erstwhile dictator of Oklahoma, has been removed from office by the Oklahoma State Senate. It has adjudged him guilty of exceeding his pardon and parole power, of padding the State payroll, of general incompetence, of exceeding the legal limit of election expenses, of preventing the assembling of a grand jury, of suspending the writ of habeas corpus, of various specific offenses. The verdict was a foregone conclusion. Such "crimes" are common fodder in Oklahoma; Walton's real guilt was his fight upon the Klan. The Senate which tried him was a Klan-controlled body. The verdict therefore proves nothing; Walton refused to enter a defense before such a court, and a real trial can come only in other courts. But the whole proceeding proves the utter folly of attempting to down the Klan by adopting its own illegal methods.

VACATIONS for kings? Well, why not? In this day when so many jobs carry with them an annual vacation, there is no reason to discriminate against the not too lucrative and certainly extra-hazardous trade of sitting eight hours a day on a throne. So it seems no more than fair that the Greeks should send their young monarch off for a few months to rest his nerves and broaden his mind in foreign travel. It may be, as some Greeks predict, that stirring times are ahead, and if somebody should take it into his head to proclaim a republic, a king might find it possible to take a more dispassionate view of the situation at a distance. Also the people might take a more dispassionate view of the king. When a revolution is in progress so prominent a symbol of royalty as a king might find it embarrassing to continue among an excitable people. One is reminded of the dodgers that were pasted up in public places of Paris some years ago when barbers were trying to induce their employers to close on Sunday. The notice read somewhat as follows: "Perform an act of solidarity and do not get shaved on Sunday. P. S.—Accidents are likely to happen to those who get shaved on Sunday."

THE scene is laid in the region of Coronation Gulf, 1,000 miles east of Herschell Island in the Canadian Arctic. Ahkak, whose wife had left him, consoled himself with Pugana, the wife of another Eskimo, first taking the pains to kill her husband and make an honest woman of her. A feud arose between Ahkak and his friends and the friends and relatives of Pugana's former husband. A tribal council was called and a death sentence was laid on Ahkak, the murderer. The sentence was carried out, with some mercy, it seems, for Ahkak was strangled with his own rawhide line instead of suffering the undesirable but common fate of dismemberment. So justice was done, with due accord for the forms and ceremonies that convert vengeance into a decorous civil rite. Enter the Canadian Mounted Police by dog train from the east. The two executors of Ahkak the Eskimo are chased and caught and brought to trial at Herschell Island along with an aged sorceress who had played a part in the first act of the drama. A jury of "traders, trappers, and whaling captains" finds them guilty, and the two men are sentenced to death. The death sentence is confirmed at Ottawa, and Corporal Thorne, of the Mounted Police, leaves for Dawson City, whence, by dog and sled, he travels 600 miles overland to Herschell Island to hang the culprits on the gallows there by December 7. That, it seems, is to be the end of the story. Vengeance again becomes decorous and legal, and there seems to be no higher power ready to swing the British executors of the Eskimo executors off into the Arctic darkness of eternity.

CHIVALRY—who wants chivalry in 1923? On November 10 the old-fashioned chivalric police commissioner of Omaha, Nebraska, ordered his men not to jail such members of the "fair sex" as might be caught speeding, but to serve on them a "golden-rule summons" instead. The members of the Omaha Woman's Club failed to appreciate such gentleness. They resented this mild form of spanking as indignantly as the best of them nowadays resent the implied assumption of feminine weakness in the offer of a seat in a street-car. "Equal rights, but no favors" is their platform. Spurning the poor police commissioner with a loud cry of "Give us jail," they demand the privilege of arrest along with their brothers who offend the law.

WAR goes on killing long after the last gun is silenced. John Koren, United States Prison Commissioner, who jumped overboard from the steamship Nieuw Amsterdam, was as truly a victim of the war as if he had died in battle. From the beginning of the war he foresaw the magnitude of the disaster; he prayed, though he knew he prayed in vain, for an immediate conclusion; he hoped for peace without victory long before Mr. Wilson made that phrase familiar. In the days when the United States was formally neutral but when the tide of feeling swept more and more strongly against Germany, Koren refused to be carried away by the flood of hysteria. His private conversations, bluntly outspoken, were reported to the Department of Justice by patriotic friends. But in the persecution that followed no important government official played any part; Koren was widely known and respected in Washington. The murderous pursuit took place in Boston, where he had lived for thirty years; it was undertaken by arm-chair warriors, gentlemen whose credulity in swallowing spy-stories betrayed intellects at the dime-novel old-sleuth stage of underdevelopment and an utter lack of the common honesty and decency to which every man is entitled in a civilized society. Koren suffered social ostracism, broken health, increasing difficulty in earning his living. Even learned societies to which he belonged made it uncomfortable for him to attend their meetings, for many of our scholars and men of science were no more noble in spirit than the ninety Germans who signed the notorious manifesto. Five years after the war is supposed to have ended Koren killed himself. Of his death certain individuals are not altogether guiltless. But the guilt goes behind the individuals to war itself, which finds so many ways of bringing out the evil in human beings and of destroying the good.

The Great Joke About Coal

ONE gets sick of reading about coal. Almost as sick as reading about Europe or the plight of the farmers. One's sense of duty, or civic consciousness, or whatever it may be called, keeps insisting that coal and Europe and the farmers are all urgent problems, in need of prayerful attention. But one's innermost clay becomes surfeited with seriousness. Now while the ensuing facts are serious enough they are not without a saving touch of absurdity.

The United States Coal Commission has just released its report on investments, profits, and margins in anthracite mining. The figures are based on an actual examination of the books of the several companies by the commission's accountants. Some of these accountants were old Federal Trade Commission men, fire-hardened in earlier coal inquiries and in the investigation of the Chicago packers. Many government reports are made up from returned questionnaires, answered by paid experts in the interest of their industrial clients. This report is no compilation of mailed schedules, but an actual examination of the underlying books. Never before have the sacred ledgers thus been opened to profane eyes.

There is a Great Joker in mine accounting. It is a Joker which operates more or less in all industries, but in mining it becomes genuinely Great. It is the question of unearned increment in the investment in mineral lands, and the depletion thereof. You buy some coal lands. You pay a million dollars for them. You dig coal—pardon, you have some miners dig it for you—for thirty years, and at the end there is nothing left but holes and rocks. The vein is exhausted; the coal is gone. So is your million, unless you have been mindful of the rules. You may have taken good profits over the thirty years, but your original investment has joined the heavenly choir unless you have each year set aside and charged to operating costs a reserve for depletion sufficient to give you back the million when the mine runs dry.

A million put in, profits betimes, and a million taken out. Fair enough under the rules of the business game. But suppose, for one reason or another, you can make it a million put in, profits betimes, and five million taken out. One owes a duty to one's family; the price level has shifted; a hundred good and sufficient reasons. And then, of course, the more depletion one charges the less income tax one has to pay. All perfectly legal too, because by a Treasury Department ruling, the market value of coal lands as of March 1, 1913, is allowed as a basis for figuring depletion and profits. If the land cost you a million, and was worth five millions in the estimation of your trustworthy engineers on March 1, 1913, you have a perfect legal right to deplete on the basis of five millions. You have a perfect legal right to charge this allowance against your profits before paying your income tax, and to set your course for taking out five millions instead of one.

Thus the inflated depletion charge, based on an inflated investment, becomes a legitimate cost of production, along with labor and royalties and dynamite and all other expenses. And a "reasonable" profit cannot be thought of which does not cover such cost. In a highly competitive industry where the fixing of prices for the finished product is beyond your control this procedure would not always benefit you except through saving income tax. You would have no assurance that prices would be sufficiently high to enable you to earn a good profit and set aside a fat depletion reserve to boot. But anthracite does not happen to be a competitive industry. It is a monopoly of a few great railroad companies, and has been so for fifty years. The coal commission recognizes it as such most explicitly. It says: "The fundamental evil in the anthracite industry is that of monopoly—the treatment of limited natural resources as if they were like other private property." Any monopoly which is worth its salt fixes prices at what the traffic will bear. This is axiomatic. But consumers sometimes are wrong-headed enough to take exception to this great economic law. Courts are sometimes wrong-headed enough to sustain such exceptions. What then could be happier than to have a trained seal like a depletion account to perform on such occasions?

So much for the theory of the Great Joker. Now as to the facts of its actual performance as disclosed by the commission. Here is the Lehigh Coal and Navigation Company, one of the "railroad" companies. Its mines have been operating for over one hundred years. Its first operations were on coal lands leased at an annual rental of one ear of corn. Subsequently it purchased 6,000 acres of land for $30,000. Later, it purchased 2,940 acres more for $1,382,000. The total original cost of its present holdings of 8,940 acres was thus $1,412,000. This is the sum which, according to accounting theory, should be depleted year by year until, when the coal on these lands runs out, the investors get back their $1,412,000 intact. But the investors have other plans in view, as the books of the company disclose. In 1871, the value of the lands was written up by $4,970,000. In 1917, when the Treasury Department ruling came along, $10,060,000 more was added arbitrarily to the investment account. "In the meantime the depletion charged by the company has amounted to $3,685,000, or two and a half times the original cost of the lands. Yet the lands still stand upon the books at $12,757,000, or nine times their original cost." So the Great Joker in the case of the Lehigh Coal and Navigation Company stands as follows:

|---|---|
| Actual cost of coal lands | $1,412,000 |
| "Write up" of 1871 | 4,970,000 |
| "Write up" of 1917 | 10,060,000 |
| Total | $16,442,000 |
| Depletion charged to date | 3,685,000 |
| Present book value | $12,757,000 |

Thus instead of getting their $1,412,000 back when the mine runs dry, the owners of this company are setting their course to get $16,442,000 back. And if the same monopolistic conditions continue in the future as have in the past, they can undoubtedly do it. Put in $1,412,000, good profits betimes, take out $16,442,000 at the end.

Some conception of the increment in coal-land values for the whole industry is also furnished by the commission. The present market value of all anthracite lands is appraised at $989,000,000 by certain operators' engineers reporting to the commission. The value of these lands now carried on the books of the several companies, including "write-ups" to date, is $640,000,000. The books, despite unheard-of efforts, are still behind the engineers. In these book figures, the commission located write-ups totaling $226,000,000, but expressly states that it "is not sure that all the appreciations in value were discovered." Time was limited; old ledgers conveniently had been lost. The commission's accountants got what they could, but they could not get it all. The original cost of all lands—cost to the present companies, be it understood—is thus something less than 400 millions against a book value of 640 millions, and an appraised value of 989 millions. If the experience of the Lehigh Coal and Navigation Company is any index, it would appear that the actual cost of the properties was one-ninth of the present book cost. But it would not be fair without further examination to apply this ratio to all.

The performance of the Pennsylvania and Hillside Coal Company is interesting. It carries its lands on its formal books at $5,000,000 (probably written up at that). It carries a special memorandum account for the same lands valued at $45,000,000. On the basis of $45,000,000 depletion is figured, profits are found, and income taxes paid. On the latter figure, the rate of profit to investment in 1921 was a modest 11 per cent. On the former figure it is 45 per cent. Thus can statistics be trained to bark and skip the rope!

Lehigh Valley and Coxe Brothers, another railroad company, have written up the value of their lands $42,050,000, on an original cost which could not have exceeded $4,000,000—$3,500,000 being written up prior to 1913 and $38,550,000 after the income-tax ruling. The Hudson Coal Company jumped its values $27,538,000 after the tax decision, and at least $5,500,000 before that time. And so the story goes.

Particularly delightful is the recent history of the Glen Alden Coal Company. This company is the illegitimate child of the Lackawanna Railroad. Ordered in 1921 to separate its coal business from its business as a common carrier, the Lackawanna proceeded to organize the Glen Alden Company to take over the coal properties. Identical interests control both companies. The coal properties had stood on the railroad books at $6,240,000. When the stockholders got through selling these properties to themselves, they stood on the Glen Alden books at $72,240,000—a modest boost, which must be "depleted"—of 66 millions, or ten times the old book investment; which in turn was probably inflated above original cost.

Meanwhile, despite these soaring depletion charges, all created out of thin air, the commission found profits for the railroad coal companies as follows:

|---|---|
| 1913 | $16,039,000 |
| 1914 | 11,814,000 |
| 1915 | 11,264,000 |
| 1916 | 14,823,000 |
| 1917 | 29,997,000 |
| 1918 | 22,369,000 |
| 1919 | 25,220,000 |
| 1920 | 33,466,000 |
| 1921 | 30,246,000 |

If depletion could be refigured and reduced to a fair amount on original cost, these profits—particularly since 1917—would appear, as they actually were, very much greater. Thus the great anthracite companies are well on the road to take from the underlying consumer anywhere from half a billion to a billion dollars, over and above their actual investment, over and above interest on that investment, and over and above yearly profits, which have long been great and which are steadily growing greater. It is, obviously, a Great Joke on the consumer.

The British Elections

"MANKIND is a creature," wrote Robert Louis Stevenson in a passage quoted by Premier Baldwin in his Manchester speech the other day, "who lives not by bread alone but principally by catchwords." That is precisely the characteristic of human nature on which Mr. Baldwin himself is depending for a victory in the general election about to be held. No variety of political or economic quackery can safely be regarded as buried beyond danger of resurrection as long as there exists a gullible public.

The defeat of the Balfour Government at the polls in January, 1906, largely due to the raising of the fiscal question by Joseph Chamberlain in 1903, was so overwhelming that many British free traders fondly imagined that the question of a protective tariff had been settled once for all. But several circumstances have conspired to make the protectionists hopeful of a very different electoral response today. A new generation of voters has arisen which has missed the advantage of the training in economic doctrine which was supplied by the thorough and exhaustive platform and newspaper discussions of twenty years ago. The departures from free trade which were made during the war and which were justified even by many lifelong free traders on the plea of a national emergency have accustomed the public mind to the spectacle of a tariff, however limited in range, in actual operation, so that there now seems nothing revolutionary in a wide extension of the same expedient. Moreover, in Great Britain, as elsewhere, there is a considerable section of the population which has no clear-cut political or economic ideas, Liberal or Conservative, free-trade or protectionist, to which it tenaciously adheres, but which is swayed by transient moods. This floating element of the electorate, large enough to turn the scale in many constituencies, may be revengeful today and conciliatory tomorrow; today it may be eager for social experiments and tomorrow afraid to venture outside the realm of use and wont; today it may follow with enthusiastic credulity the vagaries of an adventurer and tomorrow it may prefer a sober and commonplace guide. It is to this "swing of the pendulum" that Mr. Baldwin is now looking for a popular indorsement of his proposal to abandon the traditional free-trade policy of his country.

It is, of course, the widespread unemployment that gives him the greatest opportunity of an effective appeal. To the workman who is out of a job and to the business man who is searching in vain for a market for his wares, as well as to the taxpayer who feels the burden of the unemployment dole, any change may well seem to offer the prospect of better days. It is true that no one has emphasized more strongly than Mr. Baldwin himself the fact that it is the distracted state of Europe, more than anything else, that hinders a trade revival. Moreover, it is precisely the trades that could not possibly benefit from a tariff on foreign manufactures—such as the engineering, mining, cotton, building, and shipping industries—that are suffering most just now from unemployment. But against all this must be set the plausibility of the suggestion that the Englishman's present ill fortune is due to the competition of cheap foreign labor, and that it is by the elimination of "dumping" that British mills and factories are to become once more hives of constant activity. There is further the glamor of the imperialist sentiment, which has been revivified of late years through the stimulus given by the war to the nationalist spirit. Objectors may point out that the only preference that matters to the dominions is a preference on meat and wheat, which are to be excluded from the scope of the Baldwin tariff, but all the same the suggestion of an imperial economic combination has a quasi-patriotic fascination that the protectionist spellbinders will not fail to exploit.

One of the first results of the Prime Minister's adoption of protection has been the reunion of the two divisions of the Liberal Party, which is traditionally the champion of free trade in England. It would be rash, however, to anticipate that the concordat between Asquith and Lloyd George will of itself restore vitality to the party, any more than the reconciliation between Roosevelt and Taft immediately made our own Republican Party an irresistible fighting force. There are many Liberals who have such an utter lack of confidence in Lloyd George that they will not have him at any price as one of their leaders, and his welcome back to the family is not unlikely to be followed by further secessions to the Labor Party. British Liberalism, too, will enter the fray under the severe handicap that some of its own most prominent spokesmen have anything but a clean record on the fiscal question. Neither in the war nor in the reconstruction period did they keep the faith, and their inconsistency will offer many targets to the protectionist marksmen. The Labor Party, on the other hand, though it has hitherto devoted its main attention to other problems, has no infidelities on this subject to explain away, and it will be able to make effective capital out of the Baldwin policy as an attempt to evade those drastic economic reforms which it believes to be the only means of settling the industrial system of the country upon a firm and equitable basis. Whether its advocacy of the capital levy will frighten away more voters than the party's consistency will attract is a question which only the election can answer.

"The Little Red Box of Courage"

The annual sales of talcum powder, cold cream, rouge, lipsticks, and toilet powder amount to $750,000,000, or $15 for every woman in America.—Press Item.

NOT to mention $63,000,000 for perfumes and toilet waters and such matters, and $145,000,000 for fancy soaps. Even deducting a generous allowance for witch-hazel used after shaving, and talcum powder for babies, and toilet water for the strange purposes to which the Eighteenth Amendment is said to have reduced it, the totals given above are impressive. If statistics were our business we would compare these amounts with the sums spent annually for battleships and education and chewing gum and better babies and draw some rather sensational deductions. But at the moment we are interested in the philosophy of that $750,000,000.

Last summer in a large and respectable women's magazine we read an affecting article entitled The Little Red Box of Courage, and in it we found packed the secret philosophy of the rouge-pot—a philosophy so terrible, so cynical, so blood-curdling that we have had to comfort ourselves with the thought that while the dippers into the pot are many its prophets are few. The argument ran something like this: The world is a dark place, full of wars and injustices, of dying babies and devastated lands. Old standards have crumbled, old enthusiasms are dead. The mind faints and the heart fails before the demands life makes upon them. What is there left to encourage us, to give us cheer, in the midst of a harassing reality? And the answer is: The Little Red Box of Courage. Just a daub here and there on a sallow countenance and life begins again. One can lift one's head and front the world with an air of confidence, of gaiety. Not mere red paint, but bravery and humor and resistance are packed in that little red box. And so on. The author of the article cheered as the modern soldier of life marched by, wearing on each cheek that blood-red badge of defiance, and she uttered, too, a modest little cheer for herself whose job consisted in helping this vast army to equip itself for the battle.

The thunder of great events mingled with flecks of rouge-brunette created an effect of bizarre and ironic humor, where no humor was meant. But by and large that article was not funny, because by and large it was true. Like the little hip-flask of courage, the little red box has a real, authentic effect on the mind of its devotees. It undoubtedly makes it more possible to face the machine in the mill, or the boss at his desk, or the dulness of long hours of deadly work—or life, in short. It makes one believe one is beautiful and fresh-colored and full of health, as the flask makes one believe one is witty and daring and full of life. Or if it does not make one believe, it helps one to make believe—and that is almost as good. Its virtue is the virtue of a strong tonic in illness, and its vice is the falseness of the effect it produces.

Now this is not the vice its stern opponents attribute to it. Instead of pitiful makeshifts for reality, they find in that little box sheer immorality and sex allurement. Some doubt the fact of the allurement, but of that the girls have most opportunity to judge, and—well, we hesitate to argue the question of allurements. That they have their uses in the world the existence of the arts and continuation of the race seem to testify, and we have gazed with something more than compassion on them at their best. But those that are bought for $750,000,000 by the women of the country leave us cold. If they are vicious it is because they caricature nature and joke about beauty; if they are immoral it is because they indicate a terrible, humble distrust of a woman's self. But chiefly they are neither immoral nor vicious. They are pitiable. Is it anything less than a confession of fear to plaster on these masks of red and white? Consciously it may be nothing more than habit and conformity; unconsciously it is a deep need for illusion. Even habits have their causes; if rouge is a fashion like long skirts or short, ear-rings, wrist-watches, curls, bangs, and bobbed hair, still a philosophy may hide behind a fashion. The women who paint and alter their reflections in the mirror distrust themselves—they are, though often enough quite unaware of it, a little afraid of life as they meet it.

After all, the world is a hard place and a drab place and reality is strong food. Perhaps illusion is the best that men and women can live on who cannot live on life itself. Perhaps, while the mills of the gods grind so everlastingly slowly, and the mills of the men whirl so fast, it is well for the tired and the timid to paint beauty on with a piece of rag and to spend $15 or so every year on the little red boxes they keep their courage in. A new world is what we need rather than more morals.

Honor Among Allies

IN a significant exchange of notes between the United States and Great Britain, on behalf of the Allied governments, just published by the Department of State, another incipient cause of future dispute is tacitly recognized and a further humiliation is accepted by the United States. In its issue of June 6, 1923, The Nation called attention to the fact that the United States had been buncoed by the Allies out of its share of the costs, paid by Germany, for the armies of occupation on the Rhine. In an agreement concluded at Paris last May, all that the Allies did to make good this virtual embezzlement was to promise to remit to us, after certain prior Allied deductions, 25 per cent of future German reparation payments, if and when made, during the next twelve years. The agreement contained an article, however, to the effect that, if the United States did receive anything from Germany, in cash or goods, it would have to be applied to the reduction of the Rhine army bill and not to other reparations, e.g., to the satisfaction of the claims of American citizens against Germany, which include many claims having no standing whatever in international law. Unless the United States thus reduced the Rhine army bill, the Allies reserved the privilege of abrogating the entire May agreement.

This restriction on American liberty of action in dealing directly with Germany the United States has on several occasions sought to escape, but without success. After efforts to this end during the May negotiations had utterly failed, the Department of State apparently endeavored to escape from the dilemma by requesting the Allied governments to suppress the restrictive article above mentioned. In consenting to such suppression, however, the British Government in the note just published reminds the United States that under Article 248 of the Treaty of Versailles the Allied governments have a priority on all German public assets on account of "reparations and other charges" over all "other engagements and obligations of Germany." The meaning of this is unmistakable. The Allies refuse to recognize the validity of any arrangement between the United States and Germany looking to the satisfaction of American claims, but insist that they alone can deal with Germany.

The Secretary of State, evidently baffled by the stubborn attitude of the Allies, answered the British note in this weak and inconclusive fashion:

> My Government does not understand by this statement that it is intended to deny to the United States the enjoyment of the rights and advantages to which the United States is justly and equally entitled as a participant in the common victory, including the rights and advantages stipulated for its benefit in the Treaty of Versailles and accorded to the United States by the treaty signed on August 25, 1921, between the United States and Germany. It may be observed that this would in no way derogate from any of the benefits which the other Allied and Associated Powers are justly and equally entitled to enjoy.
> My Government is confident that it is no more the purpose of the other Allied and Associated Powers to attempt to discriminate against it with respect to these privileges and benefits, which would not have been secured except through the success of the common effort, than it is the purpose of the United States to seek to exercise its rights under the treaties above mentioned in any spirit other than that of equity toward its associates in the war.

What the British Government "understands" and what the United States Government "understands" seem to be entirely different things. The "confidence" of the United States in the Allied "purpose" is engaging. Of course the Allied governments intend to discriminate against us, otherwise they would hardly have appropriated our share of the Rhine army costs in the first place. That they intend to continue to discriminate against us is manifest from the British note stating in effect that German reparation payments in the future are the exclusive property of the Allies, and that Germany cannot legally promise to pay us anything. The suppressed article above referred to contained at least a tacit admission that we might obtain reparation payments direct from Germany, but stipulated for their allocation to the Rhine army bill. The present British note throws us completely out into the cold, and withdraws the tacit admission just mentioned.

The Allies doubtless rely on Secretary Hughes's declarations that "we do not seek reparations." It would be interesting to know just how Mr. Hughes would describe the appropriation of the Chemical Foundation patents and other private property of German citizens. What in Mr. Hughes's opinion is the purpose of the Mixed Claims Commission, now sitting in Washington?

At all events the Allies, who but for the United States would have had no war indemnity, no part of the nearly six billion dollars they have already collected in addition to their vast territorial acquisitions, now have the temerity to tell the United States that its hands are tied by the very Treaty of Versailles which the United States made possible, and that it may not obtain any direct payments from Germany. Every effort of Mr. Hughes to escape from this noose has been frustrated.

The complication to which this will lead may be this: The proceedings of the Mixed Claims Commission in Washington will probably be almost concluded a year hence and we shall then know the amount of our reparation bill against Germany. By a disgraceful provision of the treaty with Germany, condemned by no one more severely than by ex-Secretary Knox, we compelled Germany to sanction our retention of the seized private property of German citizens —an act without precedent in American history and in defiance of all tradition and tenets of national honor—as pledged security until Germany made "suitable provision for the satisfaction of American claims." But the British Government now says in effect that the Allied governments will not permit Germany to make "suitable provision for the satisfaction of American claims." We are invited, therefore, either to confiscate the sequestrated private property held in Washington, which even then presumably would have to be deducted from the bill for the Rhine army costs, or else we must buy and doubtless pay heavily for the consent of the Allies to deal freely with Germany. If anything is more humiliating than the position in which we are thus placed, it is the brazen way in which the Allied governments have relegated us to it.

It is our belief that the relations between the United States and the Allied governments arising out of the Rhine army costs and our reparation demands against Germany should be the subject of a congressional investigation, in order that the country may be informed of all the facts.

Did Passive Resistance Fail?

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Berlin, October 28

TODAY all Europe is in the control of an armed force. Might rules; the bayonet is king. Is it then true that the great weapon of passive resistance, in the spirit of Jesus, failed in the Ruhr, leaving its inhabitants more than ever the victims of a more brutal force than Europe has yet seen?

Well, the answer is that nothing that has happened in the slightest degree detracts from the power of the weapon of non-resistance and its availability in the future. The simple truth is that passive resistance in the Ruhr did not achieve its ultimate aim because, and solely because, the Berlin Government betrayed the cause of the German people by its mismanagement of the battle, the corruption which marked the financial side of the struggle, and the complete and absolute miscalculations on the part of the Cuno Government as to the duration of the contest and how it should be carried on.

It must be remembered that passive resistance began spontaneously in the Ruhr. When the French troops came in, the Ruhr workmen laid down their tools. Berlin had not thought of this plan of countering, but they seized upon it with joy and extended the movement not only throughout the Ruhr but through all the previously occupied territory. Naturally, being anything but pacifists, they did not bring to the struggle any loyalty to passive resistance on the ground of principle or religious belief. It was merely the one weapon to which they could turn. From the beginning Dr. Cuno was warned that he must prepare for a long struggle, perhaps for a year and a half of opposition, in order that when the spring elections of 1924 came on Poincaré would be compelled to admit that the Ruhr policy had failed to produce money for France or any supplies in considerable excess of the cost of the occupation. That would have afforded the best means of defeating Poincaré, who at this writing seems to be certain to get a new lease of power when the elections come. Dr. Cuno was, however, convinced from the beginning that it was only a matter of keeping up the resistance for two or three months, and he based his whole campaign upon this theory. No definite program for carrying on the struggle was, therefore, ever worked out. So far as I can ascertain there was not even any financial program resorted to in order to prepare for a long struggle; the sole reliance was the printing press with results anybody could foresee. Some effort was made to peg the mark at between 20,000 and 25,000 to the dollar, which succeeded for a time—long enough for some insiders, so many people believe, to enrich themselves thereby.

But there was no effort to plan for a new currency such as now (October 28) is just going into effect but which could as easily have been put into use ten months ago; there was no move to vote new taxes and otherwise to raise fresh revenues to support the battle; I cannot even find that the popular contributions to the Ruhr cause were adequately developed and encouraged by the Government. Far worse than that, tremendous corruption crept into the whole management of the finances, perhaps not so much in Berlin as elsewhere. It was difficult—the money had to be got into the Ruhr by any possible method; the least suspicious-looking messengers had to be selected to carry the huge sums needed, for the French seized messengers and stole the money whenever they could get their hands on them. That naturally opened the door to waste and at times even to theft. But besides that, insiders did enrich themselves and enormous sums might just as well have been thrown out of the window. Again, the Germans were unable to sink party differences and rivalries even in this great struggle. The petty bickerings and strife went on in the Reichstag precisely as before. It did not become, therefore, the complete and overwhelming uprising of the nation that it should have been. It did cement the nation for a while in the first months of the fight; but after that the people, nervously worn down by nine years of constant excitement, suffering, and misery, failed to focus their attention upon the struggle for the reason that the leaders failed to furnish the necessary inspired, unselfish leadership without which no passive resistance can succeed. Germany needed a Gandhi, and there is no German Gandhi.

Even when the end came, when Dr. Cuno found that the mere printing of notes would not win the battle, there was the same old lack of frankness on the part of the Government toward its own people. He himself avoided the necessity of surrender by giving place to Stresemann, and Stresemann had to surrender so rapidly that infinite harm was done to the situation in the Ruhr by the failure to resume, or rather to surrender, gradually. It was just as in 1918; the German authorities put off their surrender too long and then were in feverish haste to get it over with. Dr. Cuno is an estimable man personally and no charge of personal gain is made against him. But, like so many other German statesmen, he was totally unable to gauge public sentiment abroad. From the very beginning he was convinced that speedy help would come from America and England. He even assured a private gathering of leading Hamburg business men in March or April that he had every reason to believe that aid would soon be forthcoming from the Anglo-Saxon countries. He suffered, too, from the fact that his finance minister, Hermes, was totally unfit for the position. He had been badly besmirched in a scandal in connection with profiteering in wines, but Dr. Cuno had to keep him because the Center parties demanded that as their price for supporting his Government. So the German people were betrayed again, and the weapon of passive resistance broke in the hands of men who used it as a tool.

No one who has not been in the occupied territories can understand the sacrifices the German people there made during the passive-resistance struggle. The minute it began the French increased the pressure upon them, especially in the districts which had been occupied since the armistice. The German population was terrorized and tortured in every conceivable way. Expulsions took place in every direction. From the little town of Gerolstein 2,000 of the 3,000 inhabitants have been driven out. At first those expelled were allowed to take their furniture; later expulsions were immediate, so that the families went out, leaving their furniture standing in the rooms, which were sometimes occupied by drunken and disorderly characters. Sometimes the quarters were occupied immediately by French officials. Try to imagine what it would mean to be living in the State of Connecticut and suddenly to find yourself cut off by a military barrier from all intercourse with New York and Massachusetts and Rhode Island, without telegrams, often without mail for days and often unable to get word from or to your relatives across the line, and always in terror of being ousted from your home and robbed of all your belongings at daybreak. Sometimes there were no newspapers for days; to get anywhere people walked six, eight, and ten hours to accomplish absolutely necessary business, and nobody ever rode on the trains run by the French. In one case a woman seventy-six years of age drove three days and nights without rest in a coal cart to go to a dying daughter. But if the daughter had happened to be beyond the Rhine she could probably not have gone to her.

It is to the infinite credit of the Germans directly affected that they stood all of this without complaint and with complete faith in the righteousness of their cause and the reliability of their weapon. They have not complained now, though their torture continues and they are beginning to understand how they were betrayed by their own Government. It is another evidence of the lack of a proper sort of nationalistic feeling in Germany, which is also demonstrated in the attack on Saxony and the disloyalty of Bavaria. More than that, the passive-resistance struggle was of course utilized by the great industrialists of Germany, who are its real rulers, for their own purposes. It was they who dictated the surrender, and a very hasty surrender, when it got too hot for them and they had begun to feel that if they did not get their plants into action again they would soon never be able to put back into service some of their most delicate and costly works. Dr. Cuno was their agent; his was "a business men's government"; while Stresemann and Stinnes are not friends the Stresemann Government is none the less one of reaction and under the circumstances is inevitably the creature of these conscienceless big-business men for whom, as for their brothers in business in other countries, there is but one motto: "Where iron is, there is the fatherland." There has never been any question in my mind that they would sell out to the French the minute they were compelled to or found it to their advantage to do so.

That in such a sordid struggle the great weapon of passive resistance should have been taken up by men most of whom were without true patriotism, or any ethical concept of what they were doing and what they were using, is a misfortune for humanity. That millions of oppressed Germans were led to make the necessary sacrifices to carry this struggle on for utterly different objects than those avowed is a crime against the German people. For it all Germany is now suffering and will have to suffer, the innocent and the guilty alike. It is another evidence of the way the German people are being crushed, exploited, and degraded between the upper and nether millstones of a horrible French militarism and the selfishness and falsity of their own changing governments and the real masters of those governments—the big industrialists.

From all of which I hope it will be clear to the Nation readers that passive resistance as such did not fail; that it carried on gloriously for eight months in the face of every possible obstacle; that it fell short of success against France because it was not honestly and efficiently supported at Berlin, and that there is nothing in this experience to prove that, given proper leadership and the adequate devotion on the part of all involved, this weapon of the spirit against force cannot again be used. Some day it may yet be, and with overwhelming success, against that naked brutal force which is today bringing civilization in Europe to its fall.

Starving Germany

By AGNES SMEDLEY

"BREAD! Gott im Himmel. Have you heard that bread will cost fifteen milliards tomorrow? Buy today if you intend to live."

"Butter?" a woman screams it. "Today it is twenty-two milliards a pound! Who speaks of butter?"

Other women reply. Wild rumors are spread. Women rush through the streets, from shop to shop, like mad. Anything is believed. Anything seems possible.

In the butcher shop a woman heard the butcher tell her that meat cost twenty milliards a pound. She half crouched, as if struck, when she heard it, her expression a mixture of wild fear and shock. Then like an animal she lunged over the counter and struck him in the face.

A tiny boy stood by with a market basket on his arm. His old but clean clothing was patched until hardly an inch of the original material remained; his old black stockings were darned in a dozen places with brown yarn. On tiptoe he bashfully peeked over the marble slab and asked for one-fifth pound of Wurst and offered five milliard marks in payment. The sum was too little, but the woman gave it to him. He smiled and gravely took his purchase homeward.

In a grocery store a worn workingman, leading two children, bought one pound of the cheapest margarine and a few cubes of soup powder. His bill was eleven milliards. "Here is my wage for today," he said, laying ten milliards on the desk. "I will bring the extra milliard tomorrow."

Aside from the industrialists, the foreigners, the speculators and business men, few of the German masses of the cities get enough to eat these days. The professional and middle classes are all starving, although no one notices it, because the Germans do not parade their misery before the eyes of either their own people or of foreigners. Even in 1920 and 1921, when we heard tales of the "good living" of the masses in Germany, such workers as the skilled miners of the Ruhr—in whose homes I lived for some time—existed on a fare which no other West European or American workers would tolerate or could endure. The usual fare consisted of huge quantities of potatoes, black bread, and beer. In the homes of the higher-paid workers meat was served two or three times weekly, Wurst was occasionally to be had, and Malz (a kind of roasted cereal) took the place, as it has for years past, of real coffee. The only fat was pig's fat, used in place of butter. The vast majority of the women were anemic and chronically ailing from insufficient food, most of the children were thin, anemic little creatures, undersized and suffering from rickets, tuberculosis, and other ailments. The women suffered the most; for when there was meat to be had, they gave it to the men and to their children.

"My man must work very hard all day," they would reply to protests at this sort of thing. Just as if they did not also work all day, cooking, scrubbing, washing and ironing clothing, and caring for a household of children!

In 1922 I lived in Berlin in the home of an old widow who received a pension from the Government. This pension was so small that it barely paid her house rent. She and her little half-blind granddaughter dragged out a miserable existence on the rent received from two small rooms. I had been ill for some time and the doctor said I must have chicken broth. Chicken broth in that house, where an egg was a curiosity and meat a stranger! The old woman took her basket and started for the market. On the way the entire apartment house became aware of the fact that a chicken was to be brought home. The whole market soon knew of her pilgrimage and competed for her favor; after she had spent an hour or two informing the market of her presence and selecting a proper fowl she returned home laden with messages: the fruit woman sent to me—to the American woman rich enough to buy a chicken—the word that she had lovely strawberries for sale; the butter-and-cheese woman wished me to know of the excellence of her wares; and the flower woman had beautiful flowers for the sick.

Our neighborhood was a poor one and a chicken was an event. The prestige of the old widow went up rapidly. The woman in the apartment beneath us donated a pot for cooking the fowl, although my landlady had one; but it seems that it is not every pot which can boast of having cooked a chicken. Another woman came and offered to pluck the fowl, and still another came to take care of it while it cooked. When the cooking was finished, the old widow brought the chicken and the soup on a tray and set it beside me; then, with hands folded over her stomach, she stood watching me from the foot of the bed. Her face was that of an artist who has had an opportunity to produce a masterpiece—a hungry artist's face it was, however. To her amazement I offered her half of her handiwork. Then her silence was broken and she poured forth a tale of longing for chicken—a longing of ten years' duration, for no chicken had been in her house since pre-war days. She shook hands with me and called her granddaughter to do the same. Reverently she took the fowl away, telling me that (it was Friday) she would keep it for Sunday dinner.

That night she carefully placed the fowl in the cool air before the kitchen window and retired to sleep.

But the hand of fate intervened. Late in the evening, the poor, half-starved medical student who occupied the back room and who lived on black bread and tea, came in. He went into the kitchen to make his tea. From my room I heard the suspicious rattle of a knife or fork on a dish and I knew he—who had also seen no chicken for years—was unable to resist temptation.

Next morning the old widow was prostrate. The student, she informed me, had devoured their Sunday dinner. Against her protests, which gradually melted away in the face of facts, I gave her the other half of the chicken. And that night, after the student had been sufficiently browbeaten to insure his good behavior, the fowl was placed in the cool air on the window-sill to await the coming of Sunday. But the old woman could not sleep. Around midnight, unable to stand it any longer, she arose, awoke her little granddaughter, and the two of them had a grand midnight feast.

For months I lived with another landlady, a former peasant woman, before I learned that her thin, emaciated body was caused by constant underfeeding and not by illness. My extra food could remain in her kitchen for days and could go to waste, but neither she nor her hungry, growing boy would think of touching it. A quarter of a pound of hacked meat once a week would be shared between them. Potatoes, carrots, and black bread served for their diet. By accident I learned that they kept and used my old tea leaves after they had been used and were to be thrown away.

The workers, and in fact the vast majority of city and town people, live no better than the persons I have mentioned, it matters not what may be said to the contrary by American correspondents who live in hotels, travel second class, or who pick up their information from the talk conducted in the comfortable homes in which they secure rooms. (Americans seldom or never live as do the German masses, but only in charming rooms in wealthier homes, in hotels, or in expensive pensions.) The average workingman must support a family on an income one-third or one-half of his pre-war earnings. Furthermore, he receives his wages weekly, while prices increase daily. His salary on Saturday can buy practically nothing if it is held over even for one day.

Added to this constant undernourishment is the heartrending economic uncertainty, which is far worse than poverty. Formerly even a poor man knew that if he saved a mark for a week, it retained its purchasing power. Today, twelve milliards may buy a loaf of bread, but tomorrow it will only buy half a loaf, and next week it will not buy even one slice. In the past three days, for instance, bread has gone up from nine hundred million marks to twelve milliards a loaf; butter from two milliards to twenty-two milliards; fat from one milliard to fifteen and eighteen milliards per pound. No one even thinks of such insignificant sums as millions any more: one postal stamp for Berlin costs four millions, and for foreign postage, thirty millions. By the time this article reaches America both postage and the cost of everything else will have risen to still more fantastic figures.

The week has witnessed looting of many shops in various parts of the city, unrest in most cities throughout the country, and actual street fighting in many. Looting and rioting is regarded as so much grist to the mills of the Communists and the reactionaries alike. The Communists take advantage of it and preach their dogma; the monarchists do the same. They smile cynically when they read of the frightful increase in the cost of living and say: "It has not yet gone far enough. It must be worse still before the masses realize the mistake they have made in establishing a republic! We shall wait a bit longer." But most of the town people are so weary, so destroyed by uncertainty and long years of nervous strain, that they do not care what happens. They are tired of it all. The newspapers often publish statistics showing the alarming increase in suicides—eloquent proof of weariness and despair. From every church in Berlin funerals are held each day. They are not only suicides, of course, but are people who die of slow starvation, or of ailments which could have been cured but for long undernourishment.

Statistics, however, can never speak so eloquently as do the crowds of women with their grim faces and angry eyes standing in the cold winds for hours, waiting their turn to buy a bit of bread or fat or potatoes. These tragic lines tell a story of hunger and despair and an even sadder story of the degeneration of the city population. For in these days no one hears talk of music, or literature, or art, or of any cultural movements. Life has been reduced to a hunt for bread.

Toward Britain

(The Nation's Weekly Washington Letter)

By WILLIAM HARD

THE drift toward Britain continues; and the city of Washington seems to move again into the mood which marked it just before President Monroe delivered his well-known lecture to the European Continent one hundred years ago next month.

Then, as now, the Continent exhibited a strong resurgence of autocracy. Now, as then, the city of Washington begins to exhibit a strong recoil from thoughts of Europe as Europe to thoughts of Europe as consisting of the Continent and of Britain.

To this development the conversation here of some of the amiable and highly intelligent diplomatic representatives of certain European autocratic governments has been no inconsiderable contribution. These gentlemen seem quite unable to perceive an important difference between a government which governs well and lawlessly and a government which governs well and lawfully. Or, to put it differently, law for them seems to be any fiat by any person who by any means is on top. They seem genuinely and naively unable to attach any importance to the ideas which in 1776 caused a large number of Americans, who were being governed in fact very well and who were extremely prosperous, to mar their prosperity for seven years by fighting a war in order to establish their right to govern themselves perhaps worse.

This writer recollects now—with a belated sense of its instructiveness—a conversation which he had in 1918 with a most capable and experienced European journalist from a Southern European continental country. This writer had chanced to remark to him that presently in the United States there would be an election. "Not at all," rejoined the experienced traveler from abroad. "Your Government will not permit it. There is a war and your Government will not want an election. There will be none." This writer thereupon endeavored to persuade him that since the having of the election was commanded by the Constitution it would have to take place. The distinguished visitor was totally unmoved by this argument. He still maintained resolutely that since the election would be an inconvenience to the Government it would not be permitted.

That point of view, which seemed to this writer then to be only a curiosity, seems now to be a natural manifestation of a widespread state of mind in many European continental countries. The fiat of the sovereign seems in those countries to be the definition of law just exactly as it was when that definition first was made by the jurists of the Roman Empire.

The behavior of the representatives of such countries in an international court becomes more than ever a theme of anxious speculation in Washington.

In any case, while on the Continent the imported British fashion of representative government is more and more discarded, the minds of thoughtful American public men turn more and more to the continued constitutional course of the Mother of Parliaments on the Thames. The French begin to suffer in the esteem of Washington not only from their invasion of the Ruhr, which has many critics, but also from their inevitable immersion in the affairs of a Continent which seems increasingly to be dominated by political principles alien to those which lie at the foundation of this republic.

Vaguely and gropingly, but without pause, the impression gains ground that on much of the European Continent today, from Spain all the way to Russia, there is something as different from us and as uncongenial to our ways of political life as the Holy Alliance was a hundred years ago. The parallel so often stressed between those days and these begins to show itself with an expanding fidelity.

Britain, now as then, is the supreme victor of a mighty war and an intense sufferer from the ensuing peace. Then, having defeated Napoleon, Britain turned at home to see the burning of hay-ricks and the smashing of factory machines and a long line of other outbreaks by a hungry population. Now, having defeated William the Second, Britain turns at home to a mountainous burden of unemployment doles and to the growing power of the politicians of the proletariat.

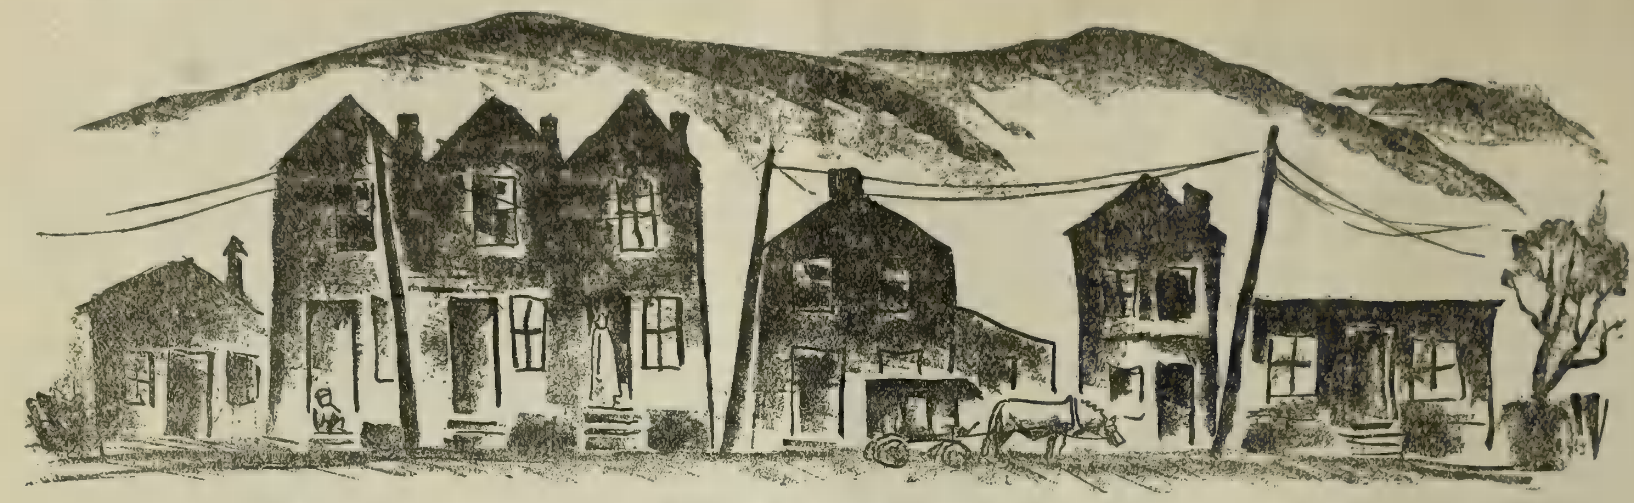
Now, as then, Britain turns to the United States and once more, in Canning's flamboyant words, "calls in the New World to redress the balance of the Old." Canning wished the United States to coöperate with Britain in the matter of the freeing of South America from Spanish trade restrictions and of the opening of it to world prosperity. Curzon wishes the United States to cooperate with Britain in the freeing of the European Continent from the restrictions, French or other, which check its trade revival and for the opening of it to the unimpeded currents of worldwide commercial interchange.

Meanwhile, then as now, the United States had refused to enter an international organization for peace, although ardently requested by the Massachusetts peace society and by the New York Evening Post to regard that organization with approving interest. Then, though earnestly solicited by the Russian envoy at Washington to cast its lot in with the Holy Alliance, the United States declined the invitation with the polite and soothing remark that it could best help the noble purposes of the Holy Alliance by staying out of it. Now an American President, unconscious of plagiarism, has repeated that same remark to a contemporary Europe desiring our presence in the League.

There followed then, as there has followed now, a period in which a faction favoring France and a faction favoring Britain could be seen threatening the internal solidarity of the American capital. Upon that period comes now, as there came then, a period in which the friendship for France wanes before the similarity with Britain in institutions and in interests.

Jefferson then counseled joint action with Britain. Many American public men are moving toward it now. Yet then it did not happen. Instead there happened—a hundred years ago next month—a declaration solitarily by the United States while Britain, not joining in the declaration and itself in time one of its victims, gave it the silent support of its men-of-war cruising and guarding the waves between the European and the South American shores.

Will there be again an American President who will assert an American course of action in a moment of world danger and assert it by himself and in the name of this country alone, while all the time behind it lies the concurrence and the latent might of Britain? That is the question which at this time of the centennial of the Monroe Doctrine is the doctrine's true contemporary suggestion.



Where the Workers Live

In the Steel Country

A Diary with Drawings

By HUGO GELLERT

I

McKEESPORT is a small town in the Pennsylvania iron region, wedged in between the Youghiogheny and Monongahela rivers. It has a street or two of stores and offices, few schools, many churches, and the sooty black shanties of the workers. Many iron bridges cross the muddy rivers. Barren hills flatten against the dull sky.

A few workers sat in the employment office of the National Tube Company as I stepped in to apply for a job. Inclosed in narrow black frames that hung on the walls were mottoes printed in large type. "Be faithful to your employer" was the beginning of one, "Don't be a knocker" was the title of the other—an Elbert Hubbard effusion. A clerk behind a small inclosure took our names. "Come back after dinner to be examined by the doctor," he said as he sent us away.

When I returned I found the office full of men, mostly foreigners and Negroes. The clerk marched us across the street to the doctor's office, where we sat in the lobby on long benches waiting for our turn. The doctor placed his palm against the lower part of the abdomen of each of us and asked us to cough. This done, our eyes were tested. Each man got a card and was told to call ready to work at the office of the labor boss on the following morning at 6:55.

I was assigned to a group of Mexican workers. Our foreman was a kindly little Irishman. We climbed into a railroad car that was filled with gravel and started to unload it. The car stood beside a long shed. The openings of the shed were above the height of the car. We had to shovel the gravel over our shoulders to get it through the openings.

One of the men spoke to me. I tried my best to answer him in his own language. He seemed grateful for it and later he told me that it should be easy for me to get a job as a foreman of the Mexican laborers, since I could speak Spanish. "I don't care to be a slave-driver," I said. He shook my hand and repeated my words to his countrymen.

This group of Mexicans had unloaded six cars of gravel in four days. We finished the seventh car at about noon on the day of my arrival. The gravel was piled high, blocking the openings of the shed, and still another car was waiting to be emptied. Two men were ordered to each opening to shovel the gravel to the far side of the shed. I was one of the men chosen for that work. While we cleared the openings the men in the car had to stand idle. Then we waited while they piled up the gravel again. The foreman did not like the arrangement and told us so. "This is hard work and we need these rests," I ventured—and it was hard work.

It began to rain hard. The men climbed into the shed. What a good-looking lot they were! Some of them were boys with little black mustachios and big sombreros. I imagined them back in Mexico among their adobe houses with their gaily arrayed muchachas. They seemed out of place in this modern industrial plant soberly viewing the smoke as it rose from the giant stacks.

The rain beat down and the wind blew it in through the openings and the smoke made breathing hard. A boy began to whistle a sad southern tune. They all took it up and chanted an endless song in slow, monotonous tones. . . . The foreman's head popped up: "Whatcha call this—a Sunday school?"

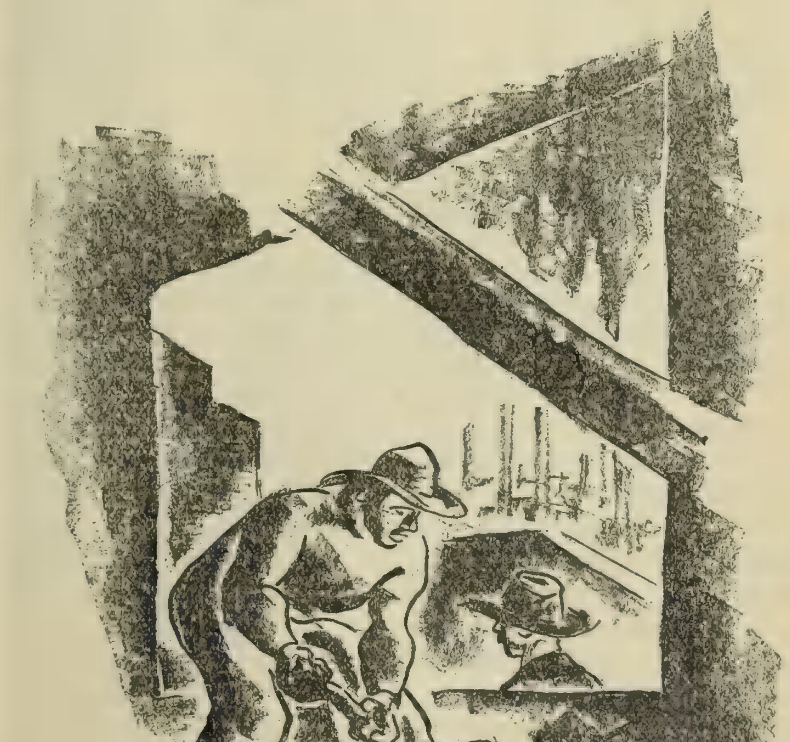
The next morning the labor boss—a cross-eyed Swede—gave me a shovel and sent me to work with an old man. The old man took me into a cellar under one of the repair shops. Behind arched openings sand was piled nearly to the ceiling. From the top of the sand-hill I could distinguish the forms of other men in the darkness—all of them old like the one who brought me. I could tell by the stoop of their bodies and by the thinness of their voices. They were talking, telling smutty jokes. Old men boasting of their conquests. The old liars! They disgusted me.

I had to shovel the sand down toward the passage. The damp dark cellar, the chattering old men, the bumping of my head against the steel beams got on my nerves. . . . I climbed up to daylight. I met the Swede labor boss. "It's a bum job you gave me," I told him. "What's the matter? It is a good yop," he answered. "Good, hell! Keeping us in a dark hole like rats."

The Mexican boys came to join us. That made it different. I was more willing to go back to work—with them.

The Mexicans and I loaded a truck full of cement. Then we all piled on top of the cement bags and drove through town to the home of the Swede boss. He had an ugly but comfortable house. We carried the cement into the cellar. Great big pieces of hard coal were stacked neatly up to the ceiling.

It was three o'clock when we returned to the mills. The boss asked the Mexicans if they wanted to work overtime that evening. He asked in a voice that warned: "I won't take 'no' for an answer." Of course they all said "Yes." It was Saturday and we stopped work at 4:30. The Mexican boys were to start again at 6 p.m. and stay at it till 6 o'clock the next morning. They worked twenty-two hours every Saturday—why not? Didn't they get good pay? Six dollars for the twelve hours. They paid us four dollars and forty cents for a ten-hour day.



Shoveling

She Would Be!

By A. NEIL LYONS

HIS real name is Robert Tiffin; but they call him Tiffy. That shows you what he is: a decent fellow; one of the best.

I have been watching Tiffy. He has inspired me with a passion of envy. I want to be like Tiffin. I want to grow a beard and look like Tiffin. I want to live the way Tiffin lives. Above all, I want to find a second Mrs. Tiffin, a spiritual twin-sister of Mrs. Tiffin, to have and to hold for my own.

He farms. He farms the eighteen acres and certain adherent rods, poles, or perches which form that snug little holding called Newton's Croft. He farms in his dressing-gown, from a front porch, sitting in a canvas-backed chair, with a baby daughter on each knee and a publication called Fireside Flashes in his hand. The pages of this book are crammed with good things, red-hot apothegms like these:

> In the bright Lexicon of youth there is no such word as "fail."—Lady Diana Manners.
> George Washington never "took it easy."—President Harding.
> If at first you don't succeed—try, try, try again.—The Bishop of London.
> Keep moving.—Eugene Sandow.

It is Tiffin's habit to read these stimulating thoughts aloud to his baby daughters. There is method, and a certain forceful calm about his way of farming which appeals to me.

I remember well the day when first I crossed the threshold of Newton's Croft. It was a Friday, and I wanted eggs. I had noticed the patriarchal group within the porch, and not being conversant with the Tiffin method of husbandry, I had supposed it to consist of "summer visitors"; for that rather profitable product is much cultivated on our landscape.

But Mrs. Tiffin undeceived me.

Mrs. Tiffin came to the door when I knocked, and we liked each other from the first. She was so bright, so fresh, so dimpled. She had such a capable look, and was evidently, like myself, a foe to sloth. She had a spade in one hand, a broom in the other, a cloth over her shoulder, and soapsuds in her hair. She said to me: "Eggs? Well, sir, our chickun don't lay none too partickler grand jist now, but if 'tis on'y 'arf-a-dozen—well, sir, I'll see if Tiffy've got a minute to spare. No doubt 'e could find you 'arf-a-dozen."

I was fortunate, it seemed. Mrs. Tiffin, after absenting herself for a minute or so, returned to tell me, with a smiling countenance, that Tiffy had stolen a minute in which to look for the eggs. Very soon he brought them, and I recognized in "Tiffy" the patriarch of the dressing-gown. We shook hands. I proffered a treasury note in payment for the eggs. But Tiffy had no change.

"Another time would do," said Mrs. Tiffin. "Any time would do," said Tiffy.

"Then next time," said your servant.

"Cert'nly!" echoed Tiffy. "Next time."

"Soon as Tiffy's got a few minutes to spare," said Mrs. Tiffin, "he'll have to run into the village and fetch a few shillings' worth of silver. We be allus wantin' it. You'll really 'a' to try and find a minute, Tiffy."

Tiffy nodded thoughtfully, and, with a little sigh of weariness, hurried off to his porch. I went home and kept the fast.

Next time it was also eggs.

Mrs. Tiffin said I had called at a fortunate moment, for the chickun had recovered their form, and Tiffin, she believed, was disengaged for a minute or two, and could visit the fowl-house at once. Whereupon Mrs. Tiffin betook herself to a grass-plot which adjoins the house, and spoke to a recumbent figure which reposed there, surrounded by baby daughters.

The figure moved and slowly uprose and walked away, and then came back again—with eggs.

"There's been a rat in that big coop," said Tiffy, gloomily, as he handed me the eggs.

"Never mind, Tiffy," responded his wife, in brisk and cheerful tones, such as all good wives should always use; "never mind; once we get the 'arvest in I daresay you can find time to run across some evenin' and nail they roof boards up."

The next time I saw Mrs. Tiffin, we spoke about dogs. But this was a matter with which Mrs. Tiffin felt herself unfitted by nature to cope. Tiffy always did the dog business. Would I have the kindness to sit down and await the return of Tiffy, which was imminent? Tiffy, finding himself actually at leisure for half an hour, had gone off into the fields with his gun. "As I say to him," said Mrs. Tiffin, "it don't do nobody no good never to amuse theirself. 'You snatch a minute while you can,' I say, 'and take your old gun out, Tiffy, and bring us 'ome a rabbit or two for Sunday.'"

Hardly had this admirable wife ceased speaking, when Tiffy returned. He wore a somber air, and was obviously fatigued and thirsty. Mrs. Tiffin, hastening indoors, brought out his canvas-backed chair, upon the seat of which he placed himself with a thud.

"We've got in the rest of that hay, dear," said Mrs. Tiffin. "So jest you set there and take it easy for once in a way."

Tiffin smiled at her, wanly. He put his hand to his coat and produced from its pocket two fat blackbirds, which, with a modestly triumphant air, he flung at the feet of Mrs. Tiffin.

"Oh, thank you, Tiffy," said Mrs. Tiffin.

"If I get a minute or two to spare termorrer," said Mr. Tiffin, "I'll get you some more. Six o' they'd make a good pie."

"Oh, thank you, Tiffy," said Mrs. Tiffin.

Mr. Tiffin then talked dog. "To tell you the truth, sir," he said, "I have got a dog and I don't care 'ow soon I gits rid of 'im; for, to tell you the truth, sir, we got the plumbers comin' in termorrer."

"We're gointer 'ave a pump," explained his wife, smiling happily on Tiffy. "'Tis no use at all for us to try to get on the same as we 'ave 'ad to get on up to now. Would you believe it, sir, every drop o' water that I use indoor that 'ave got to be carried 'ere be Tiffy."

Tiffy nodded gloomily, in confirmation of this statement.

"We're gettin' some lead put into the porch, too," added Mrs. Tiffin. "In time o' rain that let in all the water, and poor old Tiffy, he haves to quit 'is readin' and come indoor. 'Tis hard lines if poor old Tiffy, sir, can't 'ave a little read now an' then in 'is own porch in 'is own spare time."

I acquiesced; and as to the dog, I took it away, on trial.

When I came back again on the next afternoon but one to deliver my report on the dog, I found myself confronted by a scene of furious activity.

There were holes all over the roof of Newton's Croft, and plumbers, plumbers, everywhere.

Mrs. Tiffin, with a pitchfork in one hand, a baby daughter in the other, and hay in her hair, was assisting the farm-boy to build a rick; while Tiffy—ah, Tiffy was busy too.

At first I thought that I had had the luck to catch him in one of his rare moments of inactivity, for he was sitting motionless, silent, and, to all appearances, without purpose by the side of the well. But when I drew near to him, Tiffy frowned at me and explained things.

"I'm sorry, sir," said Tiffy, "but ye'll 'ave to call back again about that dog. I'm—I'm rather busy, sir. I dursn't leave this place here. You see they've took the cover off the well, sir; so I be bound to sit 'ere, to sit and watch lest 'ere one of our chickun should fall in."

Far be it from me to play the base part of tempter. Far be it from me to come between a man and his manly labors. I left Tiffy at it. I stole away. In the evening I went back again. Mrs. Tiffin invited me into the bright, warm kitchen. She placed in my hand—ignoring every protest—a glass of warm, bright liquid. I noticed that she held a wood-chopper in her hand, and that there was coal-dust on her hair. Tiffy, arrayed in dressing-gown and slippers, sat in the chimney corner behind a glass like mine.

"'Tis mulled ale," said Mrs. Tiffin, referring to the glass. "I've 'otted it up for pore old Tiffy, here. He've been so upset, sir, pore old Tiffy 'ave. . . . Happened to look up from the well for half a minute s'afternoon and bless'd if a foolish old chickun didn't fall in! . . .

"'Tis hard lines, sir," continued Mrs. Tiffin, "if pore old Tiffy can't take a minute off to fill he's pipe without a chickun fall in the well!"

She cast a look of warm affection and sympathy at the trouble-stricken man. She filled his pipe and handed it to him, together with a lighted match.

It was then I asked Mrs. Tiffin for news of her unmarried sisters, only to be told that Mrs. Tiffin was an only child.

"She would be," was my bitter thought, as I sat unhappily at home, eating beef with mustard which I had had to spread by my own labor.

A Pagan Reinvokes the Twenty-third Psalm

I knock again and try again the key,
I, who, enraged, fled from Thy temple's trees
Because the presence of my enemies
Around the table there offended me. . . .
I, who laid up so long and bitterly
Complaints and old reproaches, on my knees
Offer regret for years misspent as these,
And wonder how such folly came to be.

Anoint again my head and let me walk
The valley of the shadow, with the rod
Thou hast afforded for my comfort, God:
My soul restored, and singing through my veins.
Forgive the years of idle, foolish talk:
The cup that runneth over still remains.

Cobweb Boy

You who were the breath of spring
Now are just—not anything.
You who broke the morning dew
Of my dreaming, try—can you
Go repair a spider-swing;
Go restore a wild wasp's sting,
Put again the tangled lace
Of a milkweed in its place?
Build a snowflake? All of death
Lies in one warm hasty breath.

In the Driftway

SOMETIME ago the Drifter received, from a generous lady in Maryland, an invitation to drift in the direction of her farm sometime and get completely lost off the beaten trails. His usual custom with letters—even generous letters, and his readers may as well know it—is to keep them in his left-hand coat-pocket until they are quite worn out and then throw them away regretfully. Occasionally, however, a communication comes to him which cannot be ignored. Such a one came the other day, not from the Maryland lady but from her husband, and it shows the Drifter up in such an extremely poor light that justice demands he give it to the world.

* * * * *

"MY dear Drifter," it begins, in a deceivingly amiable way:

> for two hours only the creak of leather broke the silence, or the rattle of a halter chain. Not a bird, not even a wolf slinking through the open timber; even the footfalls of the horse were muffled and extinguished by the mat of pine needles. The swarms of mosquitoes left me at the edge of Brimstone Basin; their singing would have been welcome now. . . . At last, here is the Fundamental, nothing but nothing. Time, no, unless the pines measure time, for no living thing is here, not even earthworms. Life, none, except that in the pines. Away to the right a mile away is steam; sulphurous vapor and poisonous water emerge from the whitened rocks. . . .
> . . . A little kingdom of sixty miles width and ninety miles length. I am King, Warhorse (my horse) is Privy Counselor of the King, coyotes are my Parliament, and they meet nightly outside my door and yelp as much and as sincerely as the parliaments of men. My subjects are elk, moose, wolves, grizzlies, deer, cinnamon and black bears, mountain lions, and fishes. As motley a population as may be found in the hive you call a city. I am King, but only by the grace of these mountains. . . .

"These are excerpts," the communication went on to explain, "from letters which I wrote while living as a member of the United States Ranger Service in Wyoming, and while I was being paid $100 per month and horse furnished, for living by myself, sixty miles from the nearest human being, 120 miles from the nearest railroad, forty miles from the nearest wagon road, and for three weeks not seeing a human being. . . . You are not a devotee of my god, Solitude, my dear Drifter, you are a pretender to the priesthood! . . . Shame! The severity of the first vows appalled you . . . and now like a true dilettante you forswear Solitude and turn to the paths you have always secretly loved. . . ."

NOW, the Drifter has not drifted all these many years for nothing. Solitude, he avers, is a state of mind. It does not mean the absence of human beings or wide, free spaces in which to wander at will. There is possibly more real solitude in a great crowd of persons than anywhere else in the world, and more companionship in coyotes and mountains than the Drifter's correspondent gives them credit for. However, the Drifter admits that he is fairly hit; he has been found guilty of saying one thing at one time and something entirely different at another time. He is willing to confess, however, that this is not the full measure of his sins; if his readers read him carefully enough they would realize that he has often been in two places at once, a more difficult feat obviously than in two different states of mind. And who could expect any more of him; he is, after all, only a rough fellow who drifts about from pillar to post and makes his living by it. Could one demand, or even want consistency, reason, or principle from THE DRIFTER?

From the Book of Mormon

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In connection with passive resistance or non-resistance you might be interested in a story from the Book of Mormon, which is probably unfamiliar to most of your readers. It is from the twenty-fourth chapter of the Book of Alma.

"Now there was not one soul among all the people who had been converted unto the Lord that would take up arms against their brethren; nay, they would not even make any preparations for war. . . . they took their swords, and all the weapons that were used for the shedding of man's blood, and they did bury them deep in the earth . . . vouching and covenanting with God, that rather than shed the blood of their brethren, they would give up their own lives. . . .

"And it came to pass that their brethren, the Lamanites, made preparations for war and came up to the land of Nephi for the purpose of destroying the king . . . and the people.

"Now when the people saw that they were coming against them, they went out to meet them and prostrated themselves before them to the earth, and began to call on the name of the Lord; . . . and the Lamanites began to fall upon them, and began to slay them with the sword; and thus without meeting any resistance they did slay a thousand and five of them. . . .

"Now when the Lamanites saw this they did forbear from slaying them; and there were many whose hearts had swollen in them for those of their brethren who had fallen under the sword, for they repented of the things which they had done. And . . . they threw down their weapons . . . for they were stung for the murders which they had committed . . .

"And it came to pass that the people of God were joined that day by more than the number who had been slain . . . there were more than a thousand brought to the knowledge of the truth; thus we see that the Lord worketh in many ways to the salvation of his people."

This reminds one of Tolstoi's stories of how evil is overcome by good. But nowadays how many people in the community does one find who would rather be slain than do what they think is wrong?

The Ways of the Fathers

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Mr. Hard's parallel between the days of Harding and Coolidge and those of Washington, Adams, Jefferson, and Madison seems to me more ingenious than accurate.

The tendency of the American public (not only the statesmen and politicians) between 1789 and 1814 to line up as Anglophils and Francophils was not due merely to the lack of an "American point of view" nor to "personal factional preferences." It was a positive phenomenon, not a negative one; it reflected material interests, not airy sentiment. The mercantile and financial capitalists of the North had good business reasons for dreading a war with England more than they dreaded a war with France. If they could not be neutral, they must be Anglophil. Moreover, the success of revolutionary France, even of Napoleonic France, meant a triumph of more or less thoroughgoing Jacobinism—and that meant aid and comfort to the debt-ridden small farmers and the disfranchised mechanics and laborers, who were already becoming dangerously restive under the merchant-banker regime. The ruling classes of New England and the Middle States had thus a valid and purely domestic reason for being Francophobes. To the Southern planters, on the other hand, neither foreign war nor French victory in Europe presented any grave terrors. Their fortunes were not at the mercy of British or French cruisers; and their peculiar working class, unlike that of the North, was quite immune to Jacobin infection. What they did fear, again on very practical and domestic grounds, was the consolidation of political power in the hands of the business classes; for them, "twisting the lion's tail" was a convenient mode of attack on the real enemy, the Federalist oligarchy.

Hamilton, and Adams, and Webster on the one side, Jefferson, and Calhoun, and Clay on the other, knew quite well where they stood, because they knew what their most influential constituents wanted, and why. Our "participationists" today do not know whether, in the event of participation, they would like to help England against France or France against England. Of course not, because their backers do not yet know. Their backers do not know, because they have bet money on both sides, and stand to lose either one way or the other if the Anglo-French difficulty comes to a crisis. It is significant that, although present-day France stands for black reaction and present-day England in some measure for social progress, the more progressive among our American politicians are not markedly pro-British nor are the standpatters notably anti-British. In a word, the American line-up on European issues is not a clear one, as it was a century ago, simply because it does not coincide with any line-up of conflicting interests in this country.

Why Modern Cream Is Thin

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your issue of October 24 the Drifter wonders what has become of the thick cream of his boyhood. In the first place, cream that has come through a separator does not get as thick as cream that has risen in a pan, and in the second place, milk or cream that has been pasteurized does not produce the thick clots that he has in mind. I have a Jersey cow that I milk myself, and if the Drifter will drop in some time I'll show him some old-fashioned thick cream right from the pan. In fact, I'll turn over to him for his own consumption a whole day's output, which he can eat in any manner he likes. And I'll inform him, in case he's never tried it, that ripe tomatoes with sugar and cream beat lettuce.

From a Native Daughter

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: As dispenser of magazines in the Kansas City Public Library, I am writing to voice my disapproval of the article on Missouri by Manley O. Hudson in The Nation for October 13.

That any native son could be so lacking in patriotism and loyalty is amazing. The spirit in which this article is written is critical, unfair, grouchy; many of the facts are untrue. Some Missourians still have "to be shown," and I am one who will have to be shown that "Kansas City has no character." What does he mean by that statement anyway? Compared with other cities in the United States none has such beautiful homes or a better boulevard system; and Montgomery Ward's is beyond the city limits, I assure you.

I find none here so ignorant as the Americans he has met on the Atlantic coast, to whom "Missouri is a name for a river, a waltz, a compromise." And so Missourians do not read books? He had better consult librarians on that point rather than Baptist missionaries, for we have some statistics that can make him apologize for that statement. We know better and can show him. I learned at the University of Missouri, School of Journalism, which he concedes is a reputable institution, that the Kansas City Star ranks fifth among the best papers of the United States. We are thankful to know that we take our religion seriously. There may be some hope for Missourians in the day of the millennium. Really, we think it very regrettable that you permitted Missouri to enter These United States with such a black eye, and we should like to suggest that Mr. Hudson study for facts, style, and spirit the article, Missouri, Mother of the West, which appeared in the National Geographic Magazine for April, 1923.

Intelligence Tests for Tourists

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Since restricted immigration into this country is now with us, why not have restricted emigration out of the United States? In view of the conduct of some of our compatriots abroad, wouldn't it be a good idea for the State Department prior to the annual exodus to hold an intelligence test for departing tourists before it clothes them with the magic sanctity of an American passport?

At a time when Anglo-American amity offers a dim hope for a banged and battered world, local good feeling toward us was not promoted at Cambridge University, England, last summer by the vandalism of a group of American tourists whose idea of improving European conditions was to scratch their initials, names, and home towns into a five-hundred-year-old gate. Then while the rest of us hung our heads in shame, they proceeded to chip off pieces of the gate—tokens of British interest on the debt to America.

Yours for the Americanization of Americans.

From a Willing Correspondent

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I note frequent appeals from Central European sources for reading matter. I should be glad to get in personal touch with Germans, Austrians, and others who read and write English and who would like to correspond by letter on topics of mutual interest and receive American periodicals. I much prefer to make personal friends in this manner rather than to send impersonally. Could you help me?

Children of the Sun

The Children of the Sun. A Study in the Early History of Civilization. By W. J. Perry. E. P. Dutton and Company. $8.

WHO were the "children of the sun"? They were a remarkable group of people in very ancient Egypt and Sumer, who were once the rulers of those countries and were later identified with the gods associated with vegetation and water and fertility. Later still they became the incarnation of the sun-god. The story of their rise and fall is the story which Mr. Perry has elaborated into a history of the origins of civilization; and his tale bears witness to the powers of the human mind with its aims and desires to impose its will on its environment, and to wrest from an unconcerned nature the material for its satisfactions.

Mr. Perry is an enthusiastic member and brilliant exponent of the new school of anthropologists, of which Rivers and Elliot Smith were the leaders, which pursues the historical method of inquiry and is opposed to the old school of evolutionists of which Herbert Spencer and Charles Darwin were the great exponents. These latter assumed that human progress proceeded according to definite principles and laws, and that the study of anthropology would reveal the workings of those principles and laws. The new school, on the contrary, denies the existence of those principles, and asserts that they were mere assumptions which the records of anthropological research did not warrant. Similarity of cultures in different parts of the earth, say the historians, was due, not to the operation of laws, but to the practical demands of human beings in order to maintain life. These demands brought about a particular culture in a particular region favorable to the growth of that culture, which was spread to various other parts of the earth by migrations from its place of origin.

When food gatherers became food producers a civilization was brought into existence which reorientated man's relations with nature. He changed from what may be characterized as a condition of barbarism into a state of conscious mastery over the forces of nature. He could depend on his own efforts to keep himself alive, for his knowledge of agriculture and irrigation made him independent of chance. He could utilize the sun's energy and the properties of water to provide for his sustenance during times of winter and drought. Eygpt, more than any other country, was favorable to the discovery of those seemingly magical powers, and the first archaic civilization found its beginnings there. The discoverers of these powers were set apart from the rest of the community and, in time, endowed with divine attributes. They were treated as gods and the descendants of gods. In their search for those substances which were prized for their life-giving properties, these "children of the sun" brought their knowledge to other regions. It was thus that the wisdom of Egypt was carried to India, which, in her turn, carried it into Indonesia, from whence it spread across Polynesia, and so brought about the civilization of Maya in Mexico and Guatemala, followed by that of the Indians of North America. Always it was the specially endowed and cultured elements who civilized the peoples they came to live with, and always the transplanted civilization took on a degraded form according to the less favorable conditions it found for its growth. The Indians of North America, for example, built mounds, which are degraded forms of the stone pyramids of Mexico, and these, in their turn, are little more than degraded forms of the mighty structures of Egypt, where a complete theology of sun-worship had been long ago established and elaborated.

Thus civilization began in science, in the knowledge of how to apply the forces of nature to satisfy men's needs. It was so with religion, which did not originate in fear or the religious impulse, but was, as Elliot Smith says, "the logical interpretation of the scientific theory of the time for the practical benefit of the living; or, in other words, the means devised for receiving advice and active help of wise rulers after death. It was essentially a matter of practical politics and applied science. It became religion only when the advancement of knowledge superseded those primitive scientific theories and left them as soothing traditions for the thoughts and aspirations of mankind to cherish." The god was originally a man who could give help and advice; later, he was enriched "with the glamor of mystic symbolism," as the first Egyptians enriched Osiris. The "children of the sun" were mortals like the rest, but those whom they had so bountifully helped, apotheosized their powers, and a priesthood came into existence to solicit their supernatural boons. The infusion into the belief of mystical and symbolical elements was the work of this interested class of priests, and the further we get from the experience itself, the more mystical and symbolical does their teaching of traditions become. What in Egypt was originally the result of direct experience, became divorced from the experience as the beliefs were carried abroad and, as in the case of India, produced the speculations of the Brahmans and the Upanishads, and the theologies and cosmogonies which followed on them.

An interesting speculation is suggested by this fascinating inquiry into the origins of civilization, especially with reference to the ruling classes—an early development. Mr. Perry arrives at the definite conclusion that not only religion but political systems of state were due to the interaction of these ruling classes, and that war was entirely centered in ruling groups. From the days of power of the priesthood dispensing the wisdom of the "children of the sun" down to our own time of the empowered industrial barons, the process of development has been marked and interrupted by struggles between these ruling groups. Indeed, the hostility between them in the ages of the archaic civilization eventually broke up that civilization and brought about the disappearance of its cultural elements. The story of civilization is the story of a rise and then a decline and fall, and then a rise again in another form, but always at the mercy of the destructive powers of the ruling classes. The ruling classes go by other names today, and carry on their hostilities by other means than those used thousands of years ago, but their conflicts are of a like nature, and have ended in like dire results—in the degradation and ultimate destruction of the cultural element.

Mr. Perry's researches are of high import to the anthropologist and ethnologist, but they are of even more value to the statesman who can read between the lines of his literary presentation of the origins and progress of our human civilization.

The Lady as Artist

A Lost Lady. By Willa Cather. Alfred A. Knopf. $1.75.

SINCE American criticism is as tolerant as it is, only her own artistic conscience can explain the fact that Miss Cather has slowly and surely perfected herself in her craft. Easily pleased in general we are; we praise one writer for his interesting story, another for his satirical keenness, another for his philosophy, and still another for his realistic detail, without crying out much in protest when the defects are as glaring as the virtues. Obviously, Miss Cather has had her own counsel of perfection which has made her not so easily pleased. She has not been content to be praised justly for the vividness and freshness of the sketches which made up "My Antonia" nor for the adroitness in the handling of plot which she exhibited in the stories composing "Youth and the Bright Medusa." Instead, she has constantly struggled to achieve that synthesis of qualities which alone can make a novel really fine, and in "A Lost Lady," short and slight as it is, she has achieved it. There would be no excuse for calling it a great novel—it is not that; but there would be equally little excuse for not recognizing the fact that it is that very rare thing in contemporary literature, a nearly perfect one. Miss Cather has come to the point where she can do the two or three things at once which a novelist must do. She can evoke by a few characteristic touches and by subtle suggestion a scene and a society without producing merely a "document"; she can present a character without writing a psychological treatise; she can point a moral without writing a sermon; and hence she is a novelist.

Memory is in a very true sense the mother of her muse, for in her youth she gathered a remarkable wealth of impressions, but instead of "pouring forth" this material in the approved contemporary fashion she has brooded upon it and formed it until her picture has both composition and meaning. Thus in the new book she has evoked again an epoch of the West, the epoch which she loves, when the land had been settled by "great-hearted adventurers who were unpractical to the point of magnificence" but had not yet passed from the hands of the pioneers into the hands of the swarm of exploiters and business men who came to "develop the country" with railroad, with factory, and with the hosts of thrifty hard-headed farmers who destroyed the "princely carelessness of the pioneer" and made the land populous and hence competitive and hence mean. But at the same time she has given us an original character completely integrated with the scene and a subtle problem in morals or aesthetics.

Miss Cather has been praised, and adequately praised, so many times during the last few years for her pictures of a civilization just past that in the case of the present book a fresher task will offer itself if the critic will turn from that aspect of her work and ask himself what she means by her story and what it reveals of the things to which her soul is most loyal. This lady, lost not upon the plains but lost to "ladyhood," who seemed in her big and gracious house an embodiment of the delicacies and refinements of a civilization which, save in her, had not yet reached the plains, but who was spotted within by a secret and unworthy passion—what does she mean to Miss Cather and what is the nature of her guilt? To the romantic boy through whose eyes we see her she is simply the problem as old as the time when women first were fair and false, but to Miss Cather, I think, the guilt is not moral but aesthetic, and aesthetic in a very particular way. The lady, though she did not write nor paint nor act nor sing, was essentially an artist. She was consciously a lady, and she had devoted her vitality to the creation of a person who was more than a person, who was The Lady as a type and as a work of art, so that when she failed she failed as an artist. In a completer civilization she might have found lovers worthy of her who would not have spoiled her creation but she failed because she was not artist enough to refuse to do at all what she could not do worthily. Her life on the frontier with her aging husband would have been dreary enough, and any mere private person might have been forgiven for seeking diversion wherever he could find it, but the artist must sacrifice himself for his work. The lost lady was guilty and lost because she put her own happiness before her art and betrayed her ideal to snatch at the joy of life.

When "One of Ours" was published many critics went into sackcloth and wept for a talented writer who seemed to have given her allegiance to a vulgar ideal, but "A Lost Lady" will serve to set fears at rest. It makes clearer than any of her previous books has done the essentially aristocratic character of Miss Cather's sympathies and explains her choice of subjects. The artists and the pioneers whom she has always written about are united in their spirit of high adventure, in the romantic impracticability of their aims, and in their success in the creation of comely and rounded types—hence her interest. It is obvious that Miss Cather looks not only at her own craft but at life as well from the standpoint of one to whom fitness is all.

Shakespearean Studies

Oxford Bibliographical Society. Proceedings and Papers. Volume I, Part i. Oxford University Press, American Branch.

Shakespeare's Use of Song. By Richmond Noble. Oxford University Press, American Branch. $4.20.

Shakespeare Association Papers: "The Problem of Timon of Athens," by T. M. Parrott; "Rise and Fall in Shakespeare's Dramatic Art," by Roman Dyboski. Oxford University Press, American Branch. Each 70 cents.

In Commemoration of the First Folio Tercentenary. Oxford University Press, American Branch. $1.70.

Shakespeare in Poland. By Josephine Calina (Mrs. Allardyce Nicoll). Oxford University Press. $2.

Studies in the Development of the Fool in the Elizabethan Drama. By Olive Mary Busby. Oxford University Press, American Branch. $1.20.

THAT the lately founded Oxford Bibliographical Society begins its career with serious intentions is evident from the paper on "Standard Descriptions of Printed Books" which three of its members contribute to the first instalment of its Proceedings and which contains suggestions of value to librarians and to bibliographers generally. But we are here concerned with the other paper now published: Mr. Percy Simpson's account of "The Bibliographical Study of Shakespeare," which, like the lately published essay by Mr. Herford, is a clear and concise statement of the methods and results of the "new" Shakespearean scholarship in the three fields in which bibliography has during the past twenty years contributed so much to literary criticism. The discoveries of Messrs. Pollard and Greg as to the false dating of certain quartos of 1619; the speculations of Sir Edward Maunde Thompson as to Shakespeare's handwriting and his possible share in the play of Sir Thomas More; and the theories as to Elizabethan punctuation propounded by Mr. Simpson himself are here summarized.

Mr. Noble reprints the text of the principal songs with punctuation in accordance with the Elizabethan usage, an interesting and convincing illustration of Mr. Simpson's theory. His essay is much more elaborate than the earlier studies of the Songs by Percy Scholes and J. R. Moore. Mr. Noble insists very properly that all serious students of Elizabethan literature should make themselves aware of the impressive extent of musical culture in the age of Shakespeare. He believes that Shakespeare probably had folk-airs in mind when writing the songs. His expert knowledge of music enables him to make various interesting suggestions with regard to their rendition on the stage; but his talents as a critic of literature are by no means so robust and occasionally lead him into exegetical efforts that are fantastic. I do not believe that in the "Owl Song" Shakespeare threw into antithesis the picturesque and the disagreeable characteristics of winter, nor that "greasy Joan" keeling the pot is the climax of disagreeableness. Poor Joan! Still more forced are Mr. Noble's attempts to read dramatic satire into "Who is Sylvia?" (of which he says that "the flattery by its obvious insincerity is insulting") and "Hark, hark the lark." Nor do I believe that Shakespeare chose the "Veni Creator" as the model for "Come thou monarch of the vine," nor that, had he done so, would the choice have been "a tribute to the dramatist's exquisite judgment." Mr. Noble's inquiry centers in the comedies; in the tragedies, with two exceptions, the songs are mere ballads and snatches introduced for emotional effects and for color. But in the comedies there are very definite lines of development, from the crude contrivance of singers who are introduced upon the stage for the sole purpose of rendering the song and are then withdrawn, through the phase of children who act as well as sing, to the appearance of Amiens who not only sings, but has a definite, though minor, part in the action; and on to "Twelfth Night" where there is a thorough use of adult singers. The "Winter's Tale" develops the precedent of "Twelfth Night" with more dialogue in the songs, and the culmination is reached in "The Tempest" where "the songs are so deeply imbedded in the text as dialogue that it is unnecessary to stop the action to permit them to be performed, for they are essentially a part of it." "The more Shakespeare gained in experience, the more relevant did he make his songs to their context and the more important was their office in promoting his dramatic ends."

Mr. Parrott's solution of the problem of "Timon of Athens" is a sort of compromise between the formulae of Wright and Robertson. Like the former critic (and, in my opinion, with unquestionable correctness) he believes that a second hand completed Shakespeare's unfinished play, not, as Robertson holds, that Shakespeare's was the second hand which completed the work of another dramatist. But like Robertson he believes that the non-Shakespearean portion was largely the work of Chapman, contending, however, that those passages which Robertson explains as Chapman's reworking of Shakespeare's original draft are in reality the result of revision by a third hand of passages in Chapman's additions. Various obscurities are explained by the theory that Chapman's contributions were too long and were subjected to drastic shortening by this third party. I do not know why Mr. Parrott does not accept, nor even mention, Mr. Wright's, to me, convincing explanation of that singular crux, the scene in which Alcibiades pleads before the Senate.

A different and old-fashioned kind of criticism is seen in Mr. Dyboski's discourse upon the alternating periods of rise and fall, tension and relaxation, inspiration and exhaustion in Shakespeare's art. That great geniuses experience temporary declines in power is a truism; there are noteworthy modern instances that might be recalled. But to fit this truism into a scheme of Shakespeare's development results in unconvincing generalities.

Mr. Dyboski is the editor of the great Polish translation of Shakespeare which was published at Crakow in 1912-13 and which is the culmination of the long history of Polish interest in Shakespeare—the subject of Mrs. Nicoll's admirable little book, which, by the way, is the first instalment of a new series of studies of the influence of Shakespeare upon foreign literatures. The chief Polish translations, imitations, and critical appreciations are here succinctly appraised.

The Worshipful Company of Stationers celebrated the First Folio Tercentenary by reprinting the preliminary matter of the Folio in a handsome brochure provided with beautifully produced facsimiles and with a brief informative introduction by Sir Israel Gollancz. This is but one of several such memorial publications.

Miss Busby's essay on the Elizabethan fool does not embrace a study of Shakespeare's fools and clowns, who, however, lurk in the back of the reader's mind throughout her treatise. Her account of "origins" is largely a reworking of old material, well summarized, however. The story of the evolution of the fool as a dramatic character may be summed up in her own words: "The dramatists seem to have realized that the only way to prevent the clown from spoiling their plays was to develop his part more fully themselves and to connect it as closely as possible with the main action." Some dramatists found the most satisfactory means of making this connection in the type of comic servant; but nowhere outside of Shakespeare is the fool of such importance to the action as are Feste and the devoted attendant upon Lear. The characteristics of typical fools are well discussed: their hatred of discomfort; love of fine clothes; their rough and tumble fighting; the frequency of their songs; their blunders in speech, their sententiousness, and satiric gibes.

This review has been no more than a brief and necessarily inadequate survey of a few of the many Shakespearean studies that are constantly appearing. For the surpassingly rich field of inquiry is being explored with an unceasing and untiring enthusiasm which often adds items of real value to our understanding of Shakespeare. Samuel C. Chew

The Amazing Wrongness of Mr. Waterhouse

Random Studies in the Romantic Chaos. By Francis A. Waterhouse. Robert M. McBride and Company. $2.50.

THIS is a book difficult for me to review briefly, for I have encountered few critics who, in my opinion, manage to be wrong in such a variety of ways as Mr. Waterhouse manages to be. His volume contains eight essays—A Short History of the Philistine; Paradox on Bonaparte; An Interview with Rousseau; Victor Hugo's Operas; Realistic Objectivity versus Classical Objectivity; Rudyard Kipling—Primitivist; O. Henry—Jongleur; Mozart, Chopin, and Debussy—and each of these essays is, in my opinion, wrong after its fashion. Some are wrong in their generalizations, others are wrong in their particulars, still others have no claim to existence because they are no more than elaborated platitudes. At times the author cannot see the trees for his theoretical forest, until one is ready to cry with Grillparzer: "The devil take all theories!" At other times he scrapes the bark of particular trees with so close an attention that he is unaware of the forest. At still other times—as when he writes on O. Henry and the three composers for the piano—he verbosely reveals Polichinelle's secret with the air of a discoverer. But such harsh statements require proofs, and I shall present as many as space permits.

The first essay offers ample evidence of Mr. Waterhouse's wrongness. He begins with the statement that many critics are bewailing the dearth of "higher civilization" in the United States. He then says that none of them has isolated the cause of this dearth. After which he states simply that we have no real art or literature because of our philistines. This is his discovery: the culpability of the American philistine. It is fantastic. Can Mr. Waterhouse, even in Texas, have failed to hear the gangplank speeches delivered by successive shiploads of avowed intellectuals casting off for Europe? Here on the coast line, at least, the din of denunciation has been deafening. But I do not blame Mr. Waterhouse so much for what he has not heard as for the theory he has evolved in loneliness. Not only has he not made a new and correct discovery, but he has fallen victim, unconsciously, to a very common delusion. He and the gangplank orators, whom he has not heard, are one: they believe (perhaps the orators have lost something of this belief after sojourning in Europe) that the American philistine is an animal who is more antagonistic to art and culture than is the French philistine, the German philistine, or any other philistine whatsoever. This is the country, Mr. Waterhouse tells us, where "Nothing is given the original thinker, the subtle author, the genius of the bacteriological laboratory, the gifted composer." One looks at a map of the world and sighs to think that these United States should be so peculiar. Here is a strangely Rousseauistic error in one who sees the "deadly effects" of Rousseau's "mental poison" everywhere, in one who writes a book of essays through which Rousseau stalks as the villain of the piece, in one who will be glad when the romantic game is played out "and we shall be free to start a new one." Rousseau, in the midst of civilization, sought escape in a primitive world of his own imagination: Mr. Waterhouse, surrounded by American philistines, seeks escape in a Europe of his own imagination.

When Mr. Waterhouse seeks "a genuine picture of American life" he selects Dreiser's "The Genius." This, I think, requires no comment. Elsewhere he tells us that emphasis on plot has ousted "the classical doctrine that the characters constitute the essential element of the novel or the play." In bewilderment one turns back to Aristotle for reassurance; and having done so one is tempted to suggest to this critic that the trick endings which he hates derive directly from the "recognition scenes" in Greek tragedy. Then we read on to find that "Tom Jones" is cited as a novel in which character furnishes the chief interest. Here we stumble. But if we continue we are rewarded, with amusement at least; for on page 180 Mr. Waterhouse solemnly writes: "What the intelligentsia fails to perceive is that O. Henry is a craftsman rather than an artist, that his gift is not inspirational but mechanical, that instead of making ever new designs he repeats the same design on ever new material." And the man, out of his own originality and perception, actually writes a whole essay to prove this astoundingly novel truth.

After this, there is little more to be said.

The American Party System

The American Party System. By Charles Edward Merriam. The Macmillan Company. $3.

A BOOK by Charles Edward Merriam is an event in the literature of American politics. His studies of the development of American political theories have become the classics in that field. His most recent contribution to an understanding of the party system adds another to his searching interpretations of our political life.

It is written primarily from the point of view of the political psychologist. While he pays due attention to the historical development of parties and to their technical organization and legal status, he places major emphasis upon "the larger formations and functions . . . human behavior and conduct in the largest sense of the term," which underlie and determine party development and organization—class, race, religion, section, making the party an institution and an attitude.

In so handling the party system Mr. Merriam has succeeded eminently in freeing his analysis from the dead hand of detail and the recital of unilluminating events in the history of parties, and in charging it with the vitalizing forces of the broader and deeper currents of social contacts. From an intimate acquaintance with and participation in the political life of his own community, and a "first-hand study" of the politics of his own and foreign countries, he has enriched with the authority of experience his discussion of such problems as the composition of the party, the spoils system, the selection of official personnel.

The spoils system too often is treated with the scorn of invective, the passion of reform, or the ingenious, if specious, cynicism of defense. The anatomy of spoils has seldom been so carefully and honestly probed, its intricate ramifications so successfully explored, its results within the strictly political sphere so intimately connected with its real sources in industrial and social life, its effects upon a healthy party life so cogently set forth.

"None of the genuine interests of any political party is permanently advanced by spoils methods. At the point where the spoils system is strongest—in cities and in States—the parties are actually weakest, and in fact in many instances in cities the national parties have been excluded from the local ballot. . . . The climax of the spoils system in party affairs is the bipartisan combination in which party differences are merged and the party really vanishes. . . . Jobs and graft and spoils do not make the party possible; the party makes them possible, and is often unmade and undone by the very opportunities afforded its notorious partisans."

After summarizing the various interpretations of the party and its functions which have been offered in this country, Professor Merriam gives us his own. "The party may be looked upon as a type of social group, primarily concerned with social control as exercised through the government. The party system may be regarded as an institution, supplementary to the government, aiding the electorate in the selection of official personnel, and in the determination of public policies, and in the larger task of operating or criticizing the government." The amalgam of party solidarity is made up of various elements. Professor Merriam has made an excellent case for greater recognition of the nonpolitical constituents of party loyalty.

Children's Books

BOOKS for boys and girls,—shall we make reading a duty or shall we rather give them books to enjoy, so that so long as they live they will turn to books for fun, for solace, and for beauty? The enchantment of unknown countries, of far-distant horizons, the stimulus of contact with the spirit and the mind of man in all ages, the rhythm and thrill of fine poetry,—these they can know through books. How important, then, that we select carefully the first books our boys and girls read, letting them feel our own enthusiasm for books, and gradually allowing them a wider freedom of choice, so that their judgment of books will be personal and intense, not merely a reflection of the taste of their elders. Each season new children's books appear on the publishers' lists and there are attractive new editions of familiar older titles,—a great feast for booklovers of all ages!

Books in Brief

The Political System of British India, with Special Reference to the Recent Constitutional Changes. By E. A. Horne. Oxford: Clarendon Press. $3.50.

Mr. Horne, who is attached to the India educational service, has embodied in this useful book the substance of lectures delivered at Harvard in 1921. Beginning with a brief survey, first of the history of British rule in India from the establishment of the East India Company, and then of the complex political geography of the country, its general social and economic characteristics, and its political and constitutional development, he passes quickly to the main subject of the book, the great Government of India act of 1919 which inaugurated the reforms proposed in the Montagu-Chelmsford report. As the narrative at this point is little more than a concise record of events it does not in itself call for special comment, but the reader will find also a clear analysis of the elaborate provisions of the statute in question, a careful explanation of the conditions which dictated the recommendations of the report, and an impartial account of the difficulties which speedily developed when the new system came actually to be applied. While it is clear that Mr. Horne regards the revolutionary agitation in India as a regrettable interference with a system which ought to be allowed to work and whose results would probably be beneficent, his description of the motives and acts of the revolutionary leaders is commendably fair. That he should touch at length or very strongly upon the shortcomings or excesses of British rule in India is more than could properly be expected of a British civil servant, but his outspoken condemnation of the Amritsar massacre leaves nothing to be desired.

The Biology of Death. By Raymond Pearl. J. B. Lippincott and Company. $2.50.

Mr. Pearl is a scientist of the first order. He juggles statistics, curves, and graphs, but happily only as a means to an end. He has written a fascinating book, and he has written it in his own fashion. Not infrequently the scientist becomes a special pleader, and one has the feeling that this particular scientist finds a robust and wholesome pleasure in dealing stiff blows to accepted theories. There is no "dry rot of academic biology," nor futile and fatiguing chasing of statistical bunglers, but a lively presentation of many of the facts of life and death, with frequent touches of an attractive personality and of personal philosophy.

A Treasury of Plays for Men. Edited by Frank Shay. Little, Brown and Company. $3.

If any dramatic club is so impoverished as to be without feminine talent, it may dip into this volume with impunity, assured that there will be no situation in which the gentler sex is required. This is a companion piece to Mr. Shay's "A Treasury of Plays for Women"; it contains crook and war plays and a fair proportion dealing with less specialized themes. They are, of course, of varying degrees of effectiveness; perhaps, however, the best possible anthology when one considers that the distaff side of drama has been excluded.

Ellen Prior. By Alice Brown. The Macmillan Company. $1.50.

Patuffa. By Beatrice Harraden. Frederick A. Stokes Company. $2.

It is thirty years since the publication of "Ships That Pass in the Night," and Miss Harraden still, at intervals, writes novels to remind the world of that popular favorite. The latest is a substantial piece of work, a study in temperaments, generously understood and projected in a narrative of considerable breadth but little flavor.

Tulips and Chimneys. By E. E. Cummings. Thomas Seltzer. $2.00.

Mr. Cummings is a poet. One deduces that from his language, his observation, and an occasional idea that struggles across his pages. But he is also a pedant. His typography is so perverse that the reader is scared off before he has gone very far. The puzzle of his punctuation is not even an amusing one; it certainly is not worth solving.

Holland Under Queen Wilhelmina. By A. J. Barnouw. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.

After a quarter of a century of ruling, the Queen of Holland is still on the top of the deck, sharing with the Queen of Rumania about all there is of romantic interest attached to the sovereigns of Europe. Mr. Barnouw has composed a comprehensive and well-digested narrative of her reign, to which Edward W. Bok has written an innocuous foreword. It is well to be reminded that diminutive Holland still controls, in the Malay archipelago, an area half the size of non-Russian Europe, and is not—as some folks carelessly imagine—merely the home of tulips, windmills, and wooden shoes.

2. Manuscripts must be typewritten and must have the name of the author in full on each page of the manuscript submitted.
3. As no manuscripts submitted in this contest will in any circumstances be returned to the author it is unnecessary to inclose return postage. An acknowledgment of the receipt of each manuscript, however, will be sent from this office.
4. No more than three poems from the same author will be admitted to the contest.
5. No restriction is placed upon the subject or form of poems submitted, which may be in any meter or in free verse. It will be impossible, however, to consider poems which are more than 400 lines in length, or which are translations, or which are in any language other than English. Poems arranged in a definite sequence may, if the author so desires, be counted as a single poem.
6. The winning poem will be published in the Midwinter Literary Supplement of The Nation, to appear February 13, 1924.
7. Besides the winning poem, The Nation reserves the right to purchase at its usual rates any other poem submitted in the contest.

The judges of the contest are the editors of The Nation. Poems should in no case be sent to them personally.

Comedies

TWO American and two British comedies pass before us. There is very little, if any, difference in either literary or theatrical skill. But the American comedies are far less amusing than the British ones because they are so much less serious. This is not in the least paradoxical. No real mental adult can laugh for more than a fleeting moment at the trivial. We laugh from a great depth only at a comic treatment of grave and central things. But the authors of American comedy hrink from such subjects. They essay neither tragedy nor omedy; they are subject to the tradition that important things nust be treated at a distance and with the ignorance of mere espect. Now if you reverence a thing after a thorough knowledge of it you have hold of a very great experience indeed; f you reverence it ignorantly and by rote you know nothing either of the thing or of yourself. Good comedy can be written nly by him who has a powerful and intimate grasp of the ragic issues of human life.

Miss Zoe Akins, who wrote "Daddy's Gone A-Hunting," is ot without such a grasp. But she evidently thinks that comedy vorks with different material, whereas it works with the same naterial as tragedy, in a different mood. Schopenhauer and Shaw proceed from the same data. Miss Akins writes passages f witty dialogue, and true wit is always based on profoundly erious perceptions and thoughts. She even at one moment reates a fleeting mood of that immense melancholy which is lways in the background of true comedy. But her fable is voven of sand and her people built of bran. She seems to hink that the comic dramatist works with unrealities and fluff. She went, of course, to that card-board Zenda for a single haracter to be impersonated by Miss Ethel Barrymore. But hat character is ridiculously incredible. Such a surface canot be only surface and that is what we are asked to believe. Miss Barrymore, admirably young and agreeable in appearance and gesture, weaves that surface with her well-known nelancholy flippancy, the astonished pathos in her voice, her general attitude of the world well lost for fifteen minutes and o—as Pepys used to say—home. It was so in "The Laughing Lady"; it is so now in Miss Akins's "A Royal Fandango" (Plymouth Theater). The play and the performance are pretty nd pleasant and null.

I am sorry to have to give the same report of "The Deep-Tangled Wildwood" (Frazee Theater). I have a very serious iking and respect for the work of the authors of "Dulcy" and 'To the Ladies." In these comedies there was enough truth or laughter and enough edge for delight. The exaggeration n the new play of Messrs. Kaufman and Connelly is too gross o be amusing; the idea is too trivial to make one laugh.

How much better the British comedies are in their choice of material and in their approach to that material! Neither "Spring Cleaning" by Frederick Lonsdale (Eltinge Theater) nor "The Camel's Back" by Somerset Maugham (Vanderbilt Theater) is a masterpiece. But both start with an ironic vision of reality; both deal with a world of moods and characters that are recognizable, human, important, and therefore fit subjects for laughter. Mr. Lonsdale's theme is the more pregnant; Mr. Somerset Maugham's execution, especially in the first act, the more brilliant though not the more sustained. It is true, to be sure, that neither comedy is thinkable without the Wilde-Shaw tradition. But that tradition does not consist, as is commonly supposed, in a reckless dealing with mere paradox but in such witty restatements of the facts of life as to bring out the unrealities and self-deceptions by which most people live. Mr. Lonsdale's comedy is more firmly knit; Mr. Maugham's rather runs down in a manner not worthy of him even on this level of his work. Both plays give us, through characterization as well as through their dialogue, more than a few moments of that delighted recognition of human absurdity and its implied antithesis of wisdom which makes for that heightened vitality in the spectator at which good comedy aims. Excellent performances mark both plays. In "Spring Cleaning" Miss Violet Hemming at last adds intelligence to winsomeness; Arthur Byron is not only funny but significant; Miss Estelle Winwood has her usual astonishing incisiveness and—even in the quietest passages—electrical aliveness. In "The Camel's Back" there is Miss Violet Kemble Cooper, less florid and therefore far more interesting than is her wont, Charles Cherry who is adequate at least, and the ever excellent Louise Closser Hale.

Documents of Dissolution

THE long-heralded break-up of Germany seemed at hand in the second half of October. The Reich and Saxony, and the Reich and Bavaria were utterly at odds, and the so-called Rhenish Republic was proclaimed at Aix on October 21. Its course was closely followed by the American newspaper correspondents. The history of the Saxon and Bavarian conflicts, and of the affair in the Palatinate, which bore an obvious relation to both the Rhenish and Bavarian movements, is told in the following documents taken from the Berliner Tageblatt, Vorwärts, and Rote Fahne, the Münchner Neueste Nachrichten, and the Kölnische Zeitung.

Saxony

ON October 17 General von Müller, commander of the Reichswehr in Saxony, sent the following letter to the Prime Minister of Saxony, Dr. Zeigner:

> DEAR SIR: According to the Sächsische Arbeiter-Zeitung for October 15 the Minister of Finance, Böttcher, made a speech on October 13 at a Communist meeting held in the Zoological Garden in Leipzig, in which he said that the Coalition Government was bankrupt—either a white or a red dictatorship was coming. The working class must be armed at once. The class organs of the proletariat would represent it in the struggle for freedom. The proletarian hundreds, control committees, factory councils, and those organizations which the working class had established in its long conflict were the organs with which it would struggle. . . . The appeal to arm the proletariat is an appeal to armed battle. This speech is a defiance of the measures which I proclaimed in accordance with the order of the President of September 26. Heretofore I have counted upon the cooperation of the Saxon Government in my work. In order to continue I request you to consider the remarks of Minister Böttcher, and to inform me by 11 a.m., October 18, unequivocally, whether the entire Ministry is in agreement with the spirit and words of Minister Böttcher, and whether the Government will continue in that sense, or whether it is disposed to act against Minister Böttcher according to my directions. In the latter case, in order to make matters clear, I must ask that the Saxon Government should have its assurance to me published in the press. Furthermore, I ask what measures the Government contemplates taking in order to avoid a repetition in the future of such mistakes as the speech of Minister Böttcher. MÜLLER

To this letter Dr. Zeigner made no reply. General Müller accordingly informed him on October 18 that he had referred the matter to the Minister of National Defense. On October 20 General Müller wrote again to Dr. Zeigner:

> DEAR SIR: . . . The Reich Government has decided that I am authorized to reestablish and maintain constitutional order in Saxony with all the means at my disposal. I shall not fail to keep you properly informed. I shall inform the population of the reasons for the intervention of the Reichswehr. I hope that the measures deemed by the Government of the Reich to be necessary and in the interest of the whole nation will have the complete approval and the active assistance of the Government of Saxony. I particularly hope that you will succeed in keeping within bounds the efforts of the Communist members of your Government whose efforts obviously threaten the constitutional basis of the Reich. Only so can the hard task be accomplished of restoring constitutional order in this disturbed state of Saxony. MÜLLER

In a public proclamation issued on the same day General Müller announced that in view of the economic chaos and of the fact that a Communist member of the Saxon Government had made speeches equivalent to high treason the Government of the Reich had instructed him to create order by advancing his troops. Large bodies of the Reichswehr thereupon entered Saxony, occupying town after town, with incidents such as those described by Mr. Villard in The Nation for November 21. On October 29 the Reichskanzler named Dr. Heinze Reich Commissioner in Saxony, and he at once issued orders removing the ministers of the Zeigner Cabinet from office, fortified in this by a special decree by Ebert, President of the Reich, as follows:

> By virtue of Article 48 of the constitution of the Reich I decree, in order to reestablish public safety and order in Saxony:
> 1. The Chancellor of the Reich is empowered for the duration of this decree to remove from office members of the Saxon Government and of the Saxon Landtag and communal officials. No appeal may be made to the courts. The decree concerning the measures necessary for the reestablishment of public safety and order in the Reich dated September 26, 1923, remains unchanged.
> 2. This decree takes effect immediately.

The Saxon Cabinet deliberated upon these events and on October 29 made the following reply to the Chancellor:

> The Saxon Government determinedly declines the demand of the Government of the Reich that it resign. There is no political occasion for it, and the demand of the Reich Government has no legal basis in the constitution. Only the Saxon Landtag has the right to dismiss the Saxon Government. So long as it does not so act the Saxon Government will stick to its post. It will immediately cause a decision to be made by the Landtag.

The Zeigner Government thereupon called the Landtag into session, but General Müller immediately forebade it to assemble until called by the Commissioner named by the Chancellor of the Reich. It did not meet. Zeigner and his colleagues were driven from their offices, and a new Ministry installed.

Bavaria

THE Frankfurter Zeitung (weekly) for October 25 gives the following summary of the action of the Bavarian Government in defying the Central Government:

> General von Seeckt, commander of the Reichswehr, is bitterly slandered by the Völkische Beobachter [Hitler's paper]; the Government of the Reich confidentially requests Munich to proceed against this paper; insufficient response; direct prohibition of the appearance of the paper by the Minister of National Defense, by virtue of the Emergency Law. Von Kahr pays no attention to the prohibition; the Reichswehr is ordered to suppress the paper; its chief [in Bavaria, General von Lossow] refuses to do so and in a public telegram to his superior in Berlin refuses in the future to carry out orders which might bring him in conflict with Bavaria. The Commander-in-Chief of the Army, General von Seeckt, thereupon requests General von Lossow to resign. He refuses and appeals to the Bavarian Government.

The Minister of National Defense thereupon removed General von Lossow from office and appointed his subordinate, General Freiherr Kress von Kressenstein, commander of the Seventh Division of the Reichswehr, in Bavaria. This order both General von Lossow and the Bavarian Government refused to recognize. On October 20 Dr. von Kahr, "dictator" of Bavaria, received the representatives of the Munich press and made the following statement:

> The Bavarian Government, in view of the dismissal of General von Lossow, has come to the only possible decision: to appoint him as Commandant in Bavaria and to instruct him to bind the Bavarian Reichswehr solemnly to the Bavarian state. . . . In this situation Bavaria feels it is called upon to represent the national German feeling of the people and of the Reich in opposition to Marxist theories. It is not a question of General von Lossow or of the Reichswehr, but in the long run it is the great struggle between the Marxist, international, and un-German point of view and the national, German view of the people. Bavaria feels it is a struggle for the great German idea and its opposition has nothing to do with separatist or particularist movements.

On the same day General von Seeckt issued a proclamation declaring the action of the Bavarian Government contrary to the constitution, calling upon the Seventh Division of the army to be true to the Reich, and declaring that anyone obeying the Bavarian proclamation would thereby break his oath of loyalty to the Reich and be guilty of military insubordination. The Reich Government on the same day issued a proclamation to the people which read in part:

> On the very day on which German representatives abroad were calling the attention of the world to the unbearable conditions in the Rhineland and in the Ruhr, perpetrated by French policy, conditions making cooperation of all forces more than ever necessary in order to stand firm against the alien enemy, the Bavarian Government has presumed to break the constitution and cause a new struggle in the Reich. The excuse for this struggle was the decision upon the question whether military discipline, upon which every army is based, should prevail in present-day Germany or not. The commander-in-chief could not permit that definite orders given by him should be disobeyed by a subordinate for political reasons. An army in which the execution of an order is made dependent upon political views is not an instrument for the maintenance of the power of the state within or without. . . . The suggestion of a struggle against Marxism, made by von Kahr, has nothing to do with the question. The commander-in-chief and the Minister of National Defense have been fighting only for the authority of the Reichswehr and not for any political precept.

On the next day the various sections of the Reichswehr in Bavaria took the following oath:

> In view of the proclamation of the Bavarian Government just read to me, I declare that I recognize the Bavarian Government as the executor of the German people, and until an agreement has been reestablished between Bavaria and the Reich I renew my pledge of obedience to my superiors.

On the same day General von Lossow sent the following telegram to the headquarters of the various sections of the Reichswehr throughout Germany:

> The commander-in-chief of the army has issued a proclamation which declares the action of the Bavarian Government unconstitutional. The Bavarian Government has no thought of being disloyal to the Reich. No one surpasses us Bavarians in loyalty to the Reich. What we want is that nothing which would weaken Bavaria, the center of German and national feeling, should be forced upon the Bavarian Government and the Bavarian State Commissioner by the Berlin Government, which is under Marxist influence. It is our obvious duty in this conflict to stand by the Bavarian Government and the Bavarian State Commissioner, who seek with us to protect Germanism. This duty will be fulfilled.

No other sections of the Reichswehr responded to von Lossow's telegram, so far as is known, but it was his Bavarian section, already in conflict with the Reich, which put down the Hitler-Ludendorff uprising.

The Palatinate

THE attempt to set up an independent republic in the Rhenish Palatinate, separate from Bavaria but within the Reich, while encouraged by local French officers, was in part a genuine protest against Bavarian reaction. French support, however, ruined it. Three Socialists, Johannes Hoffmann of Kaiserslautern, Kleefoth, vice-mayor of Ludwigshafen, and Wagner, also of Ludwigshafen, discussed with General de Metz, French commander in the Palatinate, the possibility of separating the Palatinate from Bavaria while maintaining it as a part of the German Reich. General de Metz thereupon called a special meeting of the Kreistag of the Palatinate at Speyer on October 24. At this meeting Major Louis, a representative of the Interallied Rhineland Commission, announced:

> In view of the fact that the present situation cannot last without most seriously endangering the moral and material interests of the people, and in view of the disturbed and dangerous situation of Bavaria today, the Palatinate is established, beginning today, as an autonomous state with a provisional Government, pending further developments. This autonomous state of the Palatinate solemnly and unconditionally pledges itself to work with the high Interallied Rhineland Commission now and in the future with absolute loyalty, in order to fulfil all the obligations which are necessary to guarantee the reparations due to France and the security of France.

The presiding official, Privy Counselor Bayersdörfer, thereupon suggested an adjournment during which the various party groups would hold caucuses. When the assembly reopened Counselor Bayersdörfer declared, in the name of all the parties, that the Kreistag was incompetent, under the federal constitution, to deal with the matter. After a few moments of silence, in which no one asked the floor, he continued:

> I have fulfilled my duty. I have just been informed that last night both the Cabinet of the Reich and the Bavarian Government concerned themselves with this question. The Federal Government and the Bavarian Government both reject the formation of a new state in any form as an act of treason.

Vorwärts, official organ of the United Social Democratic Party of Germany, at first took the news of the Palatinate republic very seriously. Its evening edition of October 24 bore the headlines: "The Palatinate True to the Reich—Free from Bavaria! Independent Republic of the Palatinate!" October 25, however, it changed its tone.

On October 26 the following formal declaration was made by the Social Democratic Party of the Palatinate:

> . . . The leaders of the Social Democratic Party of the Palatinate came to the conclusion that, as a protest against the defiance of the constitution by Bavaria and as a protection against the menace of the separatists, the Palatinate should be established as an independent state within the German Reich. The representatives of the Palatinate Social Democracy have never wavered from this standpoint at any stage of the negotiations. Since the plan meets with serious opposition among various groups in the Palatinate, and since the Government of the Reich refuses to recognize a separation of the Palatinate from Bavaria while remaining within the Reich, we give up our program. Through our action we intended to guard against the threatening danger of separation from the Reich by the separatists. Since our intention has been misunderstood and sinister motives have been ascribed to it, we must leave responsibilities of coming events to other parties.

Nevertheless the French still recognize some sort of "independent" Palatinate Government at Speyer.

TWO sous, the cross of the Legion of Honor, and a wound badge were all he had in his pockets—and he hung himself on a war monument lately dedicated to the unknown dead by Premier Poincaré. He, too, has joined the ranks of the unknown dead, and he chose a fitting place to end his life. If he had been an American he might well have chosen the steps of the office of the Veterans' Bureau. The committee hearings degenerated into a contest in personal abuse, and the public, sickened, lost interest. The investigators and those whose conduct of office they had been investigating seemed to have forgotten the purpose of the bureau. We should hear fewer pleas for the miscellaneous bonus if ex-service men had any conviction that we were really doing our part by the men who were and are disabled. A general cynicism is natural, however, when it is discovered that the captain of a university football team is on the rolls of the disabled men receiving doles.

A SELF-CONFESSED Russian murderer sailed into New York the other day without a current passport and yet had no trouble from the immigration officials. He was Prince Youssopoff, and if he did not have a valid passport he had a slip of paper which, he said, was a diplomatic pass dating from the good old days of the Czar. As the Berengaria steamed down the harbor the prince could look across at the red roofs of Ellis Island. He probably did not know that several hundred compatriots of his were locked up in one room on that island waiting for Washington to decide whether they might be admitted or not—and had been waiting in that room, without toilet facilities and without screens, for weeks. But then, they were third-class passengers, peasant women and Jews, and he was a prince, and, if a murderer, a good counter-revolutionary. If Patrick Henry and Samuel Adams and Thomas Jefferson were alive to see that contrast in the republic they helped found, they might think another revolution necessary.

COMPTROLLER CRAIG'S sentence to sixty days in jail for contempt of court ought, as we said last week, to be the starting-point of an effort to take away from judges this medieval and autocratic power to try, convict, and punish according to their personal spleen or whim. Certainly all alleged contempt committed outside of the courtroom ought to be brought within the criminal law and made subject to trial by jury. The proposal to investigate the judicial record of Judge Mayer, or the assumption that this judgment was unusually unreasonable, is poppycock. Judge Mayer's action can be matched with all too many others; it has caused wide protest merely because Mr. Craig happens to be a victim of unusual prominence. Had he been John Doe or Richard Roe—as ordinarily—the New York newspapers would not be printing columns on the incident, nor would politicians be concerned. Their interest is not in justice but in personality. We are too much given to upholding archaic trumpery in our courts in order to preserve what we ridiculously call the majesty of the law. The majesty of fiddlesticks! Law is an infringement upon human liberty and a violation of individual sanctity; it is justifiable when the community interests urgently require it and the common will upholds it, but it is never anything but a pitiful compromise—a necessary, unmajestic evil. It is time to introduce common sense into our court proceedings, to cease to regard our judges as sacred cows. The right of trial by jury was supposedly won 700 years ago at Runnymede, but there are still some glaring exceptions. Decency and democracy demand that we gather them in.

WHILE the press and politicians of New York are making a great to-do about violation of free speech in the case of Comptroller Craig, they are notoriously indifferent, with a few honorable exceptions, to the fact that thirty-two men have spent five or more years in federal prisons—and are still there—for exercising this constitutional right during the war. We agree with Ralph Chaplin that the defenders of our liberties in connection with these men have been too humble. We should cease to petition President Coolidge, and instead demand the vindication of our fundamental law by the release of these men. And if Mr. Coolidge fails to act promptly, then a bill should be introduced in Congress to end this monstrous injustice. To talk about the majesty of the law in the face of such defilement of it is the most hypocritical buffoonery. It is time that every man in public life be called upon to take a stand on this question. Those who fail to demand unequivocally an end to this barbarism and illegality ought never to be permitted to utter the word freedom again without having it thrown back in their teeth.

JUDGE ALTON B. PARKER, president of the National Civic Federation, is at it again—this time with an impassioned defense of the "capitalist press." We commented last week upon Senator B. K. Wheeler's able reply to Judge Parker's attack upon the Senator's favorable report upon conditions in Soviet Russia. Senator Wheeler said: "I feel that my opinions are based on facts and not on the mendacious propaganda that fills the capitalist press and which you so smugly indorse in your letter." Judge Parker replied that his sources were the same as those of Secretary Hughes and Presidents Wilson, Harding, and Coolidge—which we are sure Senator Wheeler would not doubt—and continued:

> You insinuate that the "capitalist press" is our sole source of information. Your meaning is clouded. . . . You know very well that the press of our country, including nearly all the great newspapers, has freely published all the interesting and important official Soviet documents they could get hold of. . . . Even the papers most violently accused of being against the soviets, like the New York Times, have . . . taken the lead in that direction.

And more of the same. Judge Parker seems to regard the New York Times as a model of newspaper fairness. There is an obvious test to apply. How much of Judge Parker's attacks on Senator Wheeler did it print, and how much of Senator Wheeler's reply? After a careful search of a file of the Times and consultation of its index department we find that on October 31 it printed seven inches of the Parker attack; that it suppressed Senator Wheeler's reply entirely; and that on November 24 it printed six inches of Parker's reply to the reply it had not printed. Could bias go further?

IT is encouraging to learn that Circuit Judge Harry Fisher has granted a writ of mandamus compelling the city of Chicago to issue a license to Mrs. Helen G. Carpenter to establish a birth-control clinic. The city authorities, be it said to their shame, refused such a license, and plan, it is said, to appeal from the decision. In the absence of a law in Illinois against spreading birth-control information, Judge Fisher ruled that such propaganda was not immoral or contrary to public policy. He said:

> It is earnestly contended that knowledge of methods of contraception would remove, to a great extent, the only restraining influence against sex immorality on the part of unmarried women. The fear of resulting pregnancy is said to be a great deterrent to immorality. If this were true, it would be sad to contemplate the weakness of our moral sense.

IN our issue of November 14 we commented upon Secretary Hoover's speech on superpower before the chairmen of the public-service commissions of eleven States, saying that his ideas were excellent from the engineering standpoint but socially shortsighted because he proposed to turn great possibilities over to private companies for exploitation, and the economic saving would go not to consumers but to stockholders in corporations. Mr. Hoover's secretary writes to say:

> I beg to inform you that at no place has Mr. Hoover ever suggested that the savings from superpower development should be turned over to the power companies. If you will take the trouble to read his address in full you will observe that the entire statement is directed toward savings for the consumer. Any tyro in public regulation knows that its very essence is to secure just such savings for the consumer.

If we were in error in assuming from Mr. Hoover's words that he was thinking of private rather than government development of superpower, then we owe him an apology. But the stress that he placed upon "public regulation"—which his secretary reiterates—suggested that he could have in mind only private ownership. If Mr. Hoover stands for private ownership, but thinks that nevertheless the economic saving can be preserved to the consumer through "public regulation," then we differ with him. The most that such control has usually accomplished has been to mitigate outrageous gouging. A greater saving may result from private than from public ownership, but only an uncertain part of it goes to the consumer.

WHEN is Mr. Hughes going to recall from Brazil Admiral Vogelgesang and his "diplomatic mission" of thirty-eight naval officers? Dr. Samuel Guy Inman reports in the useful weekly News Bulletin of the Foreign Policy Association that he found in South America that it was having "an exceedingly bad effect." "In Argentina," he added,

> Naval officers and others again and again told me that no other construction could be put on our sending the naval mission to Brazil than that this country desired to sell war material not only to Brazil but to other South American countries—for of course we must know that to increase Brazil's navy meant that Argentina and other countries would increase theirs.

The expected has happened. Argentina, which, as Dr. Inman reports, boasted at Santiago that she had not spent any money on armaments since 1911, and that she had two school teachers to every soldier, has just voted $98,000,000 for military purposes to meet the Brazilian expansion. And for this terrible business South America holds us and our naval mission responsible.

ON the day the Court of the Canton of Vaux took up the case of the assassination of Vaslav Vorovski, Soviet envoy to the second Lausanne conference, by Maurice Conradi, a Swiss engineer, and his accomplice, Paul Polonnine, the curtain was rung up on one of the most amazing farces in the history of jurisprudence. The seventeen-page acte d'accusation presented by the state prosecutor read, according to the correspondent of the London Daily Herald, more like a newspaper article excusing the prisoner than an indictment. He was commended for his "valiant conduct" during the Russian civil war, and it was emphasized that "his goods had been requisitioned—nationalized if you will," and that "it is said that his uncle had been shot and an aunt had been massacred." The fact of the killing seemed not to be in dispute. The murder was forgotten while the court became the scene for denouncing the Bolsheviki. Mlle. Edith Conradi, cousin of the prisoner, "simply dressed in a dark-blue costume with a black hat, told of her pitiful experiences." M. Croisier declared that "if Conradi had asked him for money to assist him in committing the murder he would willingly have provided it." Polonnine asserted he was ready to continue the fight against the "Reds," even on terrorist lines. The defense made the point that the Bolsheviki had perpetrated many assassinations, and personified Conradi as "liberator of the world's conscience." The jury voted five to four for conviction, but the Swiss law requires a majority of six, and so the verdict stood that to kill a Soviet official is not murder.

IT is good news that Gerhart von Schulze-Gaevernitz is coming to the United States to lecture. Germany has too often sent to this country representatives of a past with which Americans have little sympathy. Professor Schulze-Gaevernitz has long fought for liberalism in Germany, in his sympathetic studies of contemporary England and in his advocacy of a peaceful policy of free trade, as a popular lecturer at Freiburg University and as a member of the Reichstag. During the war he courageously opposed the Belgian deportations and was singled out for abuse by Ludendorff. Since the war he has continued to plead, from his post on the edge of the Black Forest, for sanity. He is a worthy successor to Count Harry Kessler, a true people's ambassador.

NICHOLAS I, the "Iron" Czar of Russia, feared attempts upon his life. In 1835, before going to meet Friedrich Wilhelm of Prussia, he composed a letter of instructions for his son, who later became Alexander II, the grandfather of the last czar. That letter became historic in the Romanoff family, and its doctrine was a sort of Romanoff gospel. We sometimes forget, in ready denunciation of the bolshevism which we refuse to recognize, the nature of that czarism with which we maintained such cordial relations. For instance:

> When everything shall be brought in order command the Council to be summoned to you, and declare that you absolutely require the preservation in everything of the existing state of affairs, without the smallest infringement. . . .
> At the beginning, when entering into affairs, ask how things were being done before you and do not change in anything, either persons or methods . . . and then, Rule.
> Be gracious and confiding to the troops and take care of them, but do not allow in the service what was not permitted formerly.
> Guard your sisters; love them tenderly; do your best for their future fate, uniting as far as possible their weal with the advantage of the state, of which they are the property.
> Never give the Poles their own way; strengthen what has been begun, and try to complete the difficult task of the Russification of this province, by no means weakening in the measures that have been taken.
> Go forward boldly. Great is the God of Russia.

ANOTHER proverb has been disproved. More than a few do die; now and then one even resigns. Of 435 candidates elected to the House of Representatives a year ago fifteen have already died. Three, moreover, have resigned. Of ninety-six Senators elected or remaining for this Congress, three have died since election. Law-making seems to belong among the extra-hazardous callings like mining, aviation, and housebreaking; we advise life insurance companies to accept no Congressman-elect as a risk. We have been wondering why we wait a year after the people have expressed their divine will before putting it into effect. Perhaps the above statistics contain the solution of the mystery. There are even cynics who insist that a longer interval, say five years, between election and the convocation of Congress, might offer a still greater advantage.

THE award of the Nobel Prize for literature to William Butler Yeats must be a source of genuine satisfaction to all lovers of literature. He is not, like Benavente, a mediocrity for whom international trumpets have been blown; neither is he a writer whose works have the sort of actualité that commends them to the attention of the cultured crowd. He is a poet, primarily and even in his plays a lyrical poet. Nor are his strains loud and superficially compelling on the one hand, nor sophisticatedly and calculatedly original on the other. His idiom and his music are his own. But they are always the idiom and the music of essential poetry. That he is, by the consent of the judicious, the chief living poet of the Irish nation may have had something to do with the award. We prefer to believe that it was given out of a genuine appreciation of those murmuring and undeviatingly exquisite strains, that noble if not always full-bodied imagination, that deep, instinctive vision of the arts that compared them to venerable things

God gave to men before he gave them wheat.

THE career of Dr. John Clifford, who has just died at the age of eighty-seven, vigorous and active to the last, shows that it is possible, even in these days, for a minister of religion to be a zealous champion of progressive political and social causes without falling short in any of his spiritual functions. Mr. Lloyd George once described him as the best fighting man the English Free Churches had turned out since Oliver Cromwell. In election campaigns the organizers of the Liberal Party would sometimes receive, from all parts of the country, more requests for the services of Dr. Clifford as a platform speaker than for those of any but the most popular of politicians. He led, in particular, the "passive-resistance" movement of those Nonconformists who refused to pay the local taxes imposed by the Balfour Government for the support of schools which gave a religious teaching according to the doctrines of the Established Church. But Dr. Clifford's labors in the public field did not prevent him from ministering for over fifty years to the spiritual needs of a large London congregation, and during the whole of this period not a jarring note disturbed the harmony between pastor and people. Having had to leave school at the age of eleven, to work in a lace factory sometimes for sixteen or even twenty hours at a stretch, he never lost his sympathy with the victims of the industrial system, and his Liberalism was far removed from that of the laisser faire school. It was characteristic of him that one of his last public utterances was an impassioned protest against the contempt for idealism expressed in Lord Birkenhead's rectoral address.

The Most Distressful Country

NEWS from Germany is a hodge-podge of political, economic, and human distress. Where the Germans appear to see hope—in the prospect of an Anglo-American loan—there is no real hope. How could sane financiers lend money to a country in such utter chaos, with a relentless enemy in possession of its richest territory?

The Rhineland and the Ruhr are still in process of dropping away from the Reich. The process is twofold, the French soldiers and the selfish German industrialists joining to effect the same end. It is the correspondent of the London Times who writes of the Rhineland:

> The country is at the mercy of a set of crooks, cranks, and jailbirds who exploit it for their own profit in the name of an independent Rhineland. . . . They have issued reams of paper money without any backing so that the financial chaos is far worse than it has ever been in unoccupied Germany. They rob and requisition with impunity; they terrorize all persons of any position who try to stand up against them. The French maintain a pretense of neutrality but actually give the Separatists a free hand to commit any violation or illegality they like. They make it quite clear to loyal Germans that they can escape at any time from their present plight by throwing over the Reich.

What wonder, under the circumstances, if the weary Germans have failed to pitch the Separatists into the Rhine? Is it not rather a wonder that they have not yielded to the temptations which the French so sedulously spread before them? When men have been out of work for weeks and months, and their wives and children face them day after day with pinched, hungry faces they are likely to chase any passing rainbow.

In the Ruhr, where a few individuals control the great industries, the surrender to France has been made. Whether it can be fulfilled remains to be seen, but Stinnes and Thyssen, Wolff and Voegler and Krupp have signed agreements promising to do for France what they refused to do for their own Government. Their treaty with the French is almost a promise to pay a capital levy to an alien enemy. Eighteen per cent of all the coal and coke they produce they promise to the French; and in addition an export tax on coal and $15,000,000 for arrears in taxation. If these men, instead of opposing every step toward the "policy of fulfilment" of treaty obligations, had only cooperated with their own Government there might be less misery in Germany today. Implicitly the agreement recognizes the legality of the occupation, although the French agree to submit their claim for payment of the costs of the occupation to the Reparation Commission. Sir John Bradbury, the British member of the Reparation Commission, says that the agreement would secure a minimum for France and nothing for any one else. When it comes before the Reparation Commission there may be more fireworks.

Meanwhile in Berlin Dr. Stresemann has fallen from office almost unnoticed. He never really ruled. The industrialists forced him to announce the abandonment of passive resistance when he found that he could no longer pay them the wages for their men, and they thereupon took up the reins and negotiated with the French as sovereign independent nations, without so much as a "by your leave" to the political government of their country. The world-wide trend of economic forces to overshadow the old forms of political government was never more marked. Nor did Stresemann govern even in unoccupied Germany. He did not dare give orders to Bavaria; when he did they were neglected. During his regime Bavaria fell away as a constitutional part of the Reich and ceased to obey its edicts. It was not Stresemann who overthrew the Socialist-Communist coalition governments in Saxony and Thuringia, but the Reichswehr, whose leaders acted, like the Ruhr industrialists, without awaiting his approbation. Again the constitutional basis of the republic was ignored, and if the Reichswehr does not represent industrial monopolists directly it is none the less a class organ of the reactionary land-owning and manufacturing classes.

Meager dispatches report that General von Seeckt, commander of the Reichswehr, has ordered the dissolution of the Communist Party, of the "ultra-reactionary Nationalist Party," and of the Hitler "National Socialist" Party. The Berlin correspondents, with their old absorption in political events, have cabled whole columns about the political crisis but have failed to cast light on this really significant proceeding. What Nationalist groups did von Seeckt order dissolved? They do not tell us. Certainly not the Nationalist Party, monarchist though it is, for a day later Ebert is reported conferring with a leader of that party about the formation of a new Cabinet. The order to dissolve Hitler's forces is obviously a farce, for von Seeckt does not control the Reichswehr in Bavaria, where Hitler's forces rally. Von Seeckt, acting as dictator, has acted against the Communist Party. Its headquarters, and the office of its Berlin daily newspaper, the Rote Fahne, have been, the correspondents tell us, "literally cleaned out." Its funds have been confiscated, and its meetings and papers prohibited. We do not doubt it; the Communist Party, weak as has been its leadership, has become, while the Socialists were debating and disagreeing, the effective organ of working-class opposition to a monarchist dictatorship in Germany; and the necessary preliminary to a dictatorship of the Right is its suppression.

Today the German working class is politically and economically impotent. Unemployment has broken its economic strength, and its leaders have shown extraordinary political ineptitude, even apart from the fact that for them to share in the Government today might mean the final act in the separation of Bavaria. Ebert, the saddler-president, is reported to have offered the premiership to Dr. Hergt, the Nationalist leader. Hergt refused; and Dr. Albert, a politically colorless man, is to take his place.

What can Dr. Albert do? It is reported that he will carry on a policy of conciliation with Bavaria, will attempt to negotiate with the Allies without recognizing the legality of the Ruhr occupation, and will look for loans from abroad. But he cannot conciliate Bavaria without alienating still further the German working class; he cannot retain any real hold on the Ruhr while the German industrialists are yielding to the French; and it is impossible to believe that loans will be forthcoming in Germany's present plight. Decisive help can come only from without; and with England in the throes of an election and the United States still splendidly isolated it is difficult to see whence it may come. For the time being the French can continue the dismemberment of Germany; and if the result be a violent Nationalist movement that will sweep Germany and lead to armed resistance who but France will bear the blame?

Factories of Public Opinion

HOW far modern newspapers can go in distorting facts and manufacturing public opinion is pictured in a recently published booklet on "labor terrorism" in Chicago in 1922. The average newspaper reader probably remembers a succession of dispatches from Chicago a year ago last spring in which it was revealed that "a reign of terror" had been inaugurated by the unions in the building trades because of dissatisfaction with the Landis wage award. The city had been experiencing a series of crimes of violence, but they had regularly been attributed to "bandits," "gunmen," and other newspaper heroes until two policemen were murdered on the night of May 9-10. Then suddenly the character of Chicago's crime changed. The public was informed that the policemen had been killed by "labor terrorists," and presto, bandits and gunmen disappeared! Thereafter all crime was attributed to union vengeance and sabotage. The police raided the headquarters of the Building Trades Council and arrested everybody there. Some 200 persons were indicted, and the labor leaders, Shea, Murphy, and Mader, were promptly brought to trial, the chief of police declaring that he had a "wagon-load" of evidence against them. Later, thinking this scant, he increased it to "three truck loads."

At about that point the memory of the average newspaper reader begins to falter. He doesn't remember who was convicted or how many. Somehow the great sensation disappeared from the first pages, to be superseded by newer events. The one thing which sticks in the average newspaper reader's mind is that there was a reign of "labor terrorism" in Chicago in 1922; of that he is sure.

When the Chicago newspapers first began to play up the reign of "labor terrorism," George W. Whitehead, an Illinois journalist, believing the whole scare to be fictitious, decided to keep tab on their articles. In a booklet entitled "A Newspaper Frameup" he now shows, on the basis of what the newspapers themselves printed, how misleading and mendacious their publicity was. A week after the murder of the two policemen a fine apartment house, not yet completed, was burned. The newspapers announced under scare heads that the building had been in course of construction "under the Landis award," and that the fire was spite work by the dissatisfied unionists who had refused to accept that arrangement. The Chicago Tribune even quoted a resident in a neighboring building as having heard somebody announce that there would be an explosion in a minute and then shout: "To hell with the Landis award!" Later on this newspaper printed inconspicuously on an inside page a statement by the police—which few readers noted—that all the workers on the building had been union men and that the fire had been set by boys.

In ways like this the idea of "labor terrorism" was worked up and all Chicago was made to believe it, fearing and hating unionism accordingly. And then what happened? What became of the 200 indictments? Not a handful of them even came to trial. The chief of police's "three truck loads" of evidence disappeared. Not only were Shea, Murphy, and Mader acquitted, but a notorious thug without any connection with unionism, so far as the facts have been made public, was convicted of the murder of the two policemen. But of all this the public, especially outside of Chicago, heard little or nothing. Out-of-town editions of the Tribune did not even record the conviction.

A newspaper frameup? We do not altogether agree with Mr. Whitehead in this estimate. A good many well-informed persons believe that there was some violence, due to the building trades unions, in the wake of the Landis award. Anything else would have been a miracle in normal circumstances—and the circumstances were not normal. Shea, Murphy, and Mader were unsavory characters, and some intelligent Chicagoans think it possible that the man finally convicted was the victim of a conspiracy. But the course of the Chicago newspapers is not bettered by these circumstances. Quite the contrary. There was, and is, a great story the facts of which they have never printed. If there was "labor terrorism" they failed to prove it, playing instead to the gallery of popular prejudice and hysteria without evidence. There was no conspiracy among Chicago newspapers to inaugurate a reign of "labor terrorism." The trouble is that the news service of the average American daily is not directed toward ascertaining facts or recording modern history. Its two great aims are to play up current sensations and to support the editorial policy of its owners. The idea of "labor terrorism" was beautifully in line with both of these purposes. It supplied a novel angle for the reporting of crime, and it hinged with the editorial policy of enmity toward unionism. Nobody knows who first suggested "labor terrorism" in connection with the murder of the two policemen. But a mere suggestion was sufficient for every newspaper in Chicago to pounce upon the idea. The newspapers played it up to the police and the police played it back to the papers. Public hysteria was stimulated; editions were sold. The facts were left for historians to mull over after they no longer mattered.

What Is the Press?

NOT long ago there was held in London an Imperial Press Conference which attracted a large number of representatives of the newspapers of the overseas Dominions. After they had been hospitably entertained for some days at a succession of luncheons and dinners, at which the chief speakers were various prosperous publishers—mostly peers, baronets, and such like—one of the visitors inquired when they were likely to have a chance of meeting a few working journalists. The question was significant of a radical change that has affected more than the British press in recent years. Half a century ago the most prominent personalities at such a conference would have been men who could not have written a big check with the certainty of having it honored but whose pens were day by day wielding no less influence than the voices of the most eminent parliamentary leaders. Today not brains or character but money and the flair for making it are the chief assets of those who count in the British newspaper world. Lord Rothermere, Lord Beaverbrook, Sir Edward Hulton, Sir William Berry—what conspicuous national services have these men rendered to justify their being regarded as worthy guides of public opinion? It would be absurd to mention them in the same breath with, say, J. A. Spender, or H. W. Massingham, or A. G. Gardiner, three journalists of international reputation, each of whom, through the vicissitudes of the newspaper market, has recently lost his editorial chair.

Those who were most antagonistic to the public policies of Lord Northcliffe had to recognize that he possessed at any rate the qualification of being a master of his own profession. He had worked his way up from the lowest rung of the ladder, and there was no editorial or literary function in any of his offices that he was not competent to discharge. But your Beaverbrook or Rothermere would fall down on the most elementary assignment given to a cub reporter. His power is simply the power of the purse, coupled with the same knack in financial deals as that which makes fortunes on Wall Street. He speculates in newspapers as a climber of different tastes speculates in oil or copper.

The one gleam of hope in the present situation is the doubt—humiliating though it must be to any journalist to have to express it—whether the influence of the daily press is not generally overestimated. There are multitudes of readers to whom the morning or evening paper is scarcely more than a rival to the movie as a means of relieving everyday existence of its dulness and monotony. They buy it not to learn the latest developments in national or international affairs, still less to reflect upon such editorial comment as may be offered upon them, but rather to be thrilled by some sensation of the underworld or to follow the course of sporting competitions whose ups and downs they are unable to watch in person. In England as in America the evening papers in particular are catering more and more to the appetite for sport. Lord Haldane, in a recent lecture, related that one Saturday, after a long, tiring day and a tiring journey, he had wanted to see the news. He asked a newsboy for a paper. "Football or otherwise?" asked the boy. "Otherwise," replied Lord Haldane. "And so," he added, "I got the day's racing news."

The electoral history of Great Britain, like that of the United States, affords ample evidence that a huge circulation by no means implies a corresponding influence in molding public opinion, and that successful political propaganda is not dependent upon support in the daily press. Who could have forecasted the Labor gains at the last election on the basis of the comparative sales of the prosperous Daily Mail and the struggling Daily Herald? La Follette swept Wisconsin, as Reed carried Missouri and the Farmer-Laborites Minnesota, against an almost unanimous press.

There is good reason, indeed, for believing that a politician who wishes to influence the electorate through the press will find it more remunerative to cultivate the weekly than the daily field. Many people who are accustomed to cast aside the daily after a skimming of the headlines on their way to or from the office or the store give the weekly the benefit of what in comparison is a detailed and careful reading at home. La Follette's Weekly is a tremendous power in Wisconsin and, to take a totally different type of man and journal, Horatio Bottomley long exercised through John Bull a domination—there is no other word for it—over the minds of hundreds of thousands of British readers such as could not be claimed by the proprietors or editors of even the most widely circulated dailies. At the zenith of his power he could send a nominee of his own at a by-election down to a constituency with which neither he nor his candidate had any personal connection, and could get him returned to Parliament as a spokesman of Bottomley.

The labor press grows slowly and costs dearly; in the weeklies lies almost the only hope of a counterbalance to the kind of mercenary speculation which reached its culmination in the recent Beaverbrook-Rothermere-Hulton deal and brought the British press more than ever under the control of a small group of self-seeking reactionaries.

Barnum and Cook

DR. COOK has been sentenced to serve twenty years in prison for his share is a particularly flagrant Texas oil swindle, and a great many persons are indulging in lofty moralization.

Now it seems to us that a great injustice is being done the doctor. After all, Dr. Cook is perhaps this century's greatest faker, and in a country which worships at the shrine of advertising and accepts any oil speculator who succeeds he ought to receive some recognition. If Barnum is a national hero, why not Frederick A. Cook? Dr. Cook might appropriately be made the hero of a great national saga. He too was a poor boy who advertised his way to fame. He began selling fruit in Fulton Market; he peddled milk—and in the course of time he was decorated by the King of Denmark, given an honorary degree by the ancient University of Copenhagen, granted the freedom of the City of New York, and entertained at a monster dinner at which Admiral Schley presided and many men now living who would prefer to remain nameless joined to do him honor. He made a small fortune in advertising an ascent of Mt. McKinley and a trip to the North Pole, neither of which he had ever taken, and after he had been thoroughly exposed, he returned to fame as author of a series of articles explaining that he was not really sure whether he ever did get to the Pole or not.

> Place any man [he wrote] in the conditions which surrounded me, the love of life which only the proximity of death can work coloring his mind and causing him to reach a state of mental unsoundness, and he will believe with the fervor of a great unreasoning faith the pleasantest thing in his mind, the thing that will give him hope.

It does not take the proximity of death to reach that state of mind, Dr. Cook. It is the great American state of mind. We believe what we find it pleasantest to believe. Mr. Bryan denies evolution because he thinks it would be unpleasant to believe his ancestors kin to the ape. We make a religion of hope. The people who buy the sunshiny magazines that deny the realities of the world should not find it in their hearts to abuse Dr. Cook for persuading himself to believe the pleasantest thing in his mind.

Phineas T. Barnum won fame by exhibiting Joice Heth, "a Negress 161 years old, who formerly belonged to the father of George Washington," a "preserved Fiji Mermaid," and the famous woolly horse ("He is extremely complex—made up of the elephant, deer, horse, buffalo, camel, and sheep, . . . the full size of a horse, has the haunches of a deer, the tail of the elephant, a fine curled wool of camel's hair color, and easily bounds twelve or fifteen feet high . . . undoubtedly 'Nature's last,' and the richest specimen received from California"). Tastes change. Joice Heth and the Fiji mermaid might have failed to draw crowds in 1909; Dr. Cook's bogus explorations did not fail. But exposure meant nothing to Barnum, and much to Dr. Cook. Barnum prided himself on his reputation as master-deceiver of the public; his phrase "One born every minute" became a national slogan. Dr. Cook, instead of laughing at the world, tried to make more money out of whimpering. There may be more joy in heaven over one penitent sinner, but this earth hates the breed. Dr. Cook might be forgiven his oil swindle—lesser men than he have "got by"; he can never be forgiven his apologies for fooling us.

England at the Crossroads

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

London, November 16

ONE can pay a high price for political incapacity, dulness, and shortsightedness, and England is paying that now. No one can hear the Prime Minister, Mr. Stanley Baldwin, address the House of Commons without being attracted by his pleasant voice and personality, his straightforward method of speaking, and his obvious sincerity. Also one cannot hear him without being amazed that a man who has plainly little strength of personality or force of character should have been placed in the foremost political office in England. It is not enough to be a nice man; not enough to take the duties of your high office with genuine conscientiousness. To conduct the affairs of state other qualities are requisite or the results will be disastrous. England is today paying several kinds of prices because there was no one the Conservatives could hit upon as the successor to Bonar Law except this pleasant gentleman and business man, who had no more distinguished himself during his service in Parliament than did Warren G. Harding during his term in the Senate of the United States.

So England has found itself in the hands of one who in foreign affairs, in a most critical moment in history, could neither play a great and strong role nor prove himself a strategist and statesman—who seems to be molded by those he is with—witness his extraordinary volte face during his interview with Poincaré. In domestic affairs he has suddenly undergone a complete change of heart. The terrible plight of the unemployed in Great Britain—no worse than it has been for several years—has suddenly weighed upon him so heavily that he finds himself compelled to devote all his thought to it. That thought produces the remarkable belief that this unemployment, which he himself but a short time ago correctly believed could be cured only by a restoration of Germany and the rest of Europe to the normal processes of life, can now be remedied only by the final abandonment of England's historic policy of free trade. It makes no difference that this remedy at best cannot be put into effect for months. It does not move the Prime Minister that, according to his own lips, the industries he seeks to protect would not, if revived by his medicine, absorb more than 140,000 of the 1,500,000 unemployed. No, his conscience tells him that this is the remedy and his conscience will not let him apply it without an express mandate from his fellow-countrymen. It is an honorable conscience and as such is to be respected, but it is a genuine misfortune that in this case an honorable conscience is coupled with extraordinary dulness.

Undoubtedly it has been one of the great advantages of the British parliamentary system that a Prime Minister could dissolve a Parliament on short notice, go to the country, and quickly obtain a mandate as to a given policy. It has always seemed a better arrangement than our rigid system, under which Congress must live out its legally constituted life, can adjourn only by act of its members, and can be called in extraordinary session only by act of the executive. So I am rather surprised to find British radicals and liberals envying us this rigidity. They have, many of them, a feeling that Baldwin's conscience has, by a remarkable coincidence, begun to work just when his Government is at a hopeless impasse—I mean hopeless for a mentality of the type of Baldwin—in foreign affairs and when many astute politicians know that an election now will find the Labor Party and its trade-union supporters at a low ebb financially, quite unable to undergo the expense of fighting another general election. There are even some who suspect that Mr. Baldwin, finding that there is no royal road out of either foreign or domestic difficulties, has deliberately sought dissolution in the hope that the duty to govern may fall to Labor with a resultant failure and loss of public confidence. That theory is quite too Machiavellian. Rather, it assumes a political astuteness and farsightedness I cannot associate with Mr. Baldwin, and it ignores the indisputable fact that the ins rarely if ever deliberately turn over to the opposition the power and privilege of governing.

No, England is plainly paying for the Baldwin type of mind. So it has been plunged into a three weeks' campaign to discuss what one member declared the other day to be the most momentous issue brought before Parliament in his lifetime, save only the question of entering the war. If we Americans have groaned over the length of our presidential and congressional campaigns and envied England the shortness of her appeals to the electorate for fresh mandates, here is an appalling briefness of period in which to discuss any issue as complicated, as far-reaching, and as vital as that of protection versus free trade. Three weeks! Why, there will hardly be time to produce campaign literature and have it printed and circulated among the constituencies before the time will come to go to the ballot-box. Since the British press is less than ever before inclined to print extensive arguments, the reliance must more than ever be upon the spoken word. For this three weeks is an incredibly short time; the only merit of its brevity is that it will make the burden of expense lighter upon those who have the least money.

How then are the parties going to fare? Well, the bulk of opinion inclines to the belief that, despite its lack of funds, the Labor Party will lose none of its total number of seats and may even gain as many as thirty—most optimists say twenty. For it the situation is complicated because an admirable courage and consistency have made it place at the forefront of its campaign the proposed capital levy. It is not in Ramsay MacDonald's nature to sidetrack a party plank because that would be politically expedient. Many a politician would have glossed this over with the easy public assurance that it is not the issue of the hour, but something to be taken up at a more promising time. More than that, the Labor Party has declared for all its old platform and has declined to cooperate with the Liberals, although by doing so they might together easily give Baldwin an overwhelming defeat. Instead, the Labor Party has refused, in its own words, to permit the red herring of protection to divert it from the steady and consistent pursuit of its larger aims and general program. That is a phenomenon not often witnessed in these days. There is genuine danger that this may cost it dearly, for both Conservatives and Liberals are going to work the specter of a capital levy for all it is worth. Already there are advertisements appearing in the London dailies telling you how and where to invest your money to escape the loss of capital through the proposed levy.

As for the Liberals, I hardly think that any readers of The Nation are permitting themselves to be surprised at the reunion of Lloyd George and of Mr. Asquith. There never was any real breach of principle, and these two men, so accustomed to seeking office, can hardly live without the chance of victory and power. Americans who remember how readily the quarrel between Roosevelt and Taft was made up will certainly not be greatly puzzled in observing the burying of the hatchet by Lloyd George and Asquith. Should by any chance the Liberals be asked to form the next Ministry, the question whether the greatest of political acrobats would serve under Asquith and whether Asquith could again take the chance of being knifed in the back by his supposedly loyal lieutenant would become a really burning issue. Today the Liberals are confident that they are going to win many more seats. Their closed ranks will by themselves assure them successes, and they are hopeful that many of those voters who deserted them last year for Labor will now find their way back. They appear not to be worrying about funds, and they have a righteous economic cause, with many historic slogans to fall back upon. They are magnificently equipped with brilliant platform speakers, while the Conservatives have nobody of force and distinction and power to campaign for them—even Lord Birkenhead is too heavy a load to carry, though his ability and attractive personality make him a very effective debater. Friends who have been traveling over England for the last few weeks tell me that there is extraordinarily little response to Baldwin's catchwords and that even some of the manufacturers who might expect to benefit from the proposed tariffs are not at all in favor of a change.

It is then only the Tories who can lose seats. They have nothing, or next to nothing, to which they can point with pride as the result of their conduct of the affairs of the country. A growing number of Englishmen are aware that never in the memory of the present generation has British prestige stood so low on the Continent. A growing number, if a much smaller one, realizes that if Great Britain cannot take the lead in bringing about a settlement of the European entanglement another war is the inevitable outcome. The business man, so far from feeling grateful to Baldwin, is ordinarily damning him for not letting well enough alone and for upsetting business. Baldwin himself cannot electrify anybody in the Lloyd George manner, or arouse intense enthusiasms. Yet I find very few people who do not think that Baldwin will continue to be the Prime Minister. The Conservatives can lose a hundred seats and still dominate, though they would have to rule as a minority and would hardly be in a position to force through their proposed tariffs. When it comes to opposing government measures there will be no reason why Labor and Liberals should not vote together against Baldwin. Hence there is actually the possibility of another election in 1924. In fact one of the shrewdest political observers I know looks forward to a series of elections for some years to come.

At present Labor does not, of course, wish to win sufficient seats to have the right to form the Ministry and rule. They will not be in the least down-hearted if they stand still, for they realize well that they need more experience and more parliamentary training. They want to acquire a great deal more knowledge about a good many things. Eager as they are to aid the unemployed and to get their plans for social regeneration and reform under way, they are content to wait. They know that to take office and produce no vital results would be to go under a cloud for years. They are not anxious to have to extricate the country from the foreign mess into which it has drifted since the war.

One gets, after five years' absence, a fresh feeling of the vitality and determination of this great people and of its courage. There are few evidences in the London districts the ordinary visitor traverses of the strain upon the country. Unemployed processions are at an end. One no longer sees masked officers playing hand-organs in order to get the money to live. After Berlin there seem remarkably few beggars. There is an extraordinary amount of rebuilding going on in London—some streets like Regent Street have been almost entirely reconstructed, because of the falling in of ground leases and the abundance of capital available for building operations. The housing schemes are working well, and the Government insists that 1923 will be the most satisfactory year in its record of new homes begun and of those completed. It is the unemployment doles, of course, beggarly as they are, which keep the unemployed off the streets—perhaps also in hopeless resignation.

But the menace of the workless is there. No country in this situation is in anything else than a most dangerous state. Hundreds of thousands are actually forgetting how to work and, what is worse, thousands and thousands of young persons of both sexes are being turned out of school at sixteen only to find it impossible to obtain employment. If the habit of regular work cannot be instilled in them by the time when they are twenty-one, what chance will there be of creating it thereafter? The Government has undertaken a number of enterprises for temporary relief, such as the questionable plan to build seventeen new cruisers, but all that these proposals will accomplish is pitifully little compared to the total number of unemployed. What Mr. Baldwin and the Die-Hards fail to see is that there can be no real relief until the lost foreign markets are restored. That means grappling with France. For that, it is maintained, public opinion is not ripe—a pleasant euphemism with many for the fact that the Beaverbrook and Rothermere press is opposed to this policy. So neither a Liberal leader nor a Labor nor a Conservative one makes the speech that ought to be made every day. That is left to one who is half an outsider—General Smuts. And the Government drifts—which may result in its finding itself suddenly some fine day in a worse hole than it now thinks possible.

But the people would not follow any vigorous policy against the French? Well, if you had stood with me near the Cenotaph at Whitehall on Armistice Day and witnessed that wonderful silence which reduced so many to tears; if you had noticed that these pilgrims to that shrine of love for the wasted dead were not of the ruling classes but the relatives of the private soldiers; if you had observed in addition their earnestness and devout reverence at the afternoon meeting in Trafalgar Square, with its call to righteousness and to a renewal of faith and a rededication to the ideals which the leaders of the country during the war pretended were those for which England was fighting, why then you would have come away with a certain belief. And that is that these plain people of England would rise tomorrow to any policy which would prevent that new catastrophe now so clearly impending—provided only those in authority tell them all the facts and point the only, the Christian way, out.

The Filipinos' Side

By MAXIMO M. KALAW

I. INDEPENDENCE

PHILIPPINE life centers upon three main things: Independence, Wood, and Rubber.

Independence was the battle-cry of the soldiers of Aguinaldo in the memorable struggles of 1896 and 1898. Independence was on the lips and in the hearts of Filipino revolutionists when they refused to surrender to American arms after President McKinley had decided to retain the islands. True, in the fateful years that passed after the defeat of the Filipinos in arms—when the force of American sovereignty reasserted itself and all signs of resistance to America had to be suppressed—the cry of independence was not heard in the fields of Luzon, or in the mountains of Visayas, or in the wilderness of Mindanao. Yet the feeling was there just the same, dormant, latent, inarticulate, only awaiting another opportunity for vigorous expression. The Philippine Commission, the then governing body of the islands, had passed a sedition law, prohibiting any agitation for independence. No political parties could exist which favored independence. As soon, however, as the ban was lifted, as soon as the sedition law was repealed and the people were allowed to express their feelings freely, protestations in favor of independence were again heard everywhere. Parties advocating the granting of independence were established. Some used such expressive phrases as "immediate independence" and "urgent independence." The party which had placed in its platform the idea of permanent annexation to the United States and ultimate statehood—the Federal Party—was, in the elections of 1907, completely snowed under. Out of the eighty seats in the lower house, or Assembly, it secured only sixteen.

Since 1907 independence has dominated the politics of the Philippines. Advocates of permanent annexation have never since been able to hold any elective office. The Nacionalistas, who had routed the Federalists on the issue of immediate independence, for a long time asserted that the defeat of the party would be the defeat of the people in their struggle for independence. On that ground they maintained themselves in power for fourteen years.

Local issues on which there should be honest differences of opinion among public men cannot be developed because the overshadowing question is independence. The politician and the demagogue still appeal to the people and the voters with the old-time harangue on independence. Self-criticism, which should be the greatest factor for social reform, cannot be indulged in, for immediately imperialists and retentionists would get hold of the defects of the people and expose them to the American nation as an argument against independence. A hypocritical situation exists and will continue so long as independence remains unsolved.

II. WOOD

The next feature of the situation that must be reckoned with is Wood—statuesque Leonard Wood. Before him, Francis Burton Harrison reigned for six years. And before Harrison five other American governors had succeeded one another, beginning with William H. Taft. To Taft is given the credit of establishing civil government in the islands. He became unpopular with the Americans in the Philippines when he enunciated the policy of the "Philippines are for the Filipinos" and stood against the exploitation of the people. He did not, however, entirely please the people, for he was against early independence. His successors followed in his footsteps—the policy of developing the natural resources, the building of schools and roads, and the enforcement of sanitary measures. The Filipinization of the civil service and the expediting of independence were not given emphasis, so that when Harrison came he found a people strongly agitating for independence, for greater autonomy, for more Filipinos in the service. Relations between Americans and Filipinos were very much strained. He delivered a famous address on the Luneta in which he announced a new era. He said that henceforward the Filipinos would control not only the lower house but also the upper house; that there would be Filipinization in the service; and that every step would be taken with a view to hastening independence. He made good his word. He asked for the resignation of many American officials and put Filipinos in their stead. He gave the Filipinos in the Government greater control of their affairs. He asked Washington that the Philippines be given participation in the European War so that the question of independence might be brought up at the peace conference. He recommended in his reports to both President and Congress the granting of independence on the basis that there was a stable government in the Philippines.

Such was the state of affairs when Wood came. With the triumph of the Republicans, the Filipinos were afraid lest the autonomy granted them under the Harrison regime be withdrawn or greatly reduced. But they believed that Wood would be the best possible man if a Republican had to be sent. He was already in the Philippines at the time as member of the Wood-Forbes mission to investigate conditions in the islands.

Wood's inaugural address was, from the Filipino standpoint, a good deal better than the Wood-Forbes report. He spoke of a government through the representatives of the people in the legislature. The first months of Wood, however, were disappointing to the people. He had a different concept of the Governor Generalship from that of Francis Burton Harrison. Harrison reigned, but did not govern. He tried to follow the preamble of the Jones law which would give all the powers of government to the people except those which might impair American sovereignty. He left every domestic affair in the hands of the people or their representatives, and took active leadership only in matters which pertained to external affairs.

Wood seemed to have a different concept of his duties. He would reign and also govern. He considered his position primarily as a great administrative office, directly controlling every town of the Philippines. He would not admit that the cabinet was in any way responsible to the legislature, but only to himself. He would have direct supervision over all offices in the executive departments. Finding that Harrison had given much discretionary power to executive heads—all Filipinos with one exception—he surrounded himself with a number of what are called extralegal experts, mostly army officers.

Naturally, this attitude was not favorably received by the leaders of the people. During the first year of Wood's reign, the Nacionalista Party, which had hitherto controlled 90 per cent of the votes and the seats in the legislature, was threatened with a split. The two leaders, Manuel Quezon and Sergio Osmeña, got into a heated controversy on party leadership, the result of which was that Quezon separated from the Nacionalista Party and formed what he called the Colectivista-Nacionalista Party. Wood found this opportunity to exercise many of the prerogatives of a supreme administrator. There was, naturally, disorganization among the Filipino element in the Government, which favored Wood's contention. Many laws were passed which had not been studied carefully. Wood then made a tremendous use of the veto power by vetoing sixteen bills. Francis Burton Harrison seldom if ever vetoed bills, on the ground that the legislature representing the people should exercise practically all domestic powers and should be allowed to pass the bills it wanted.

The elections of 1922 came. Three parties went in, and they came out with almost equal shares, not one of them controlling a majority of the lower house, which was made up as follows: Colectivista-Nacionalistas (Quezon's party), 32; Democratas (opposition), 26; Nacionalistas (under Sergio Osmeña), 21. The Colectivista-Nacionalistas and Nacionalistas formed a coalition. The former (Nacionalistas who had seceded under the leadership of Manuel Quezon, president of the Senate) had a bare majority in the Senate, so with the Colectivista-Nacionalista coalition in the House, the members of the former Nacionalista Party were in power. One of the reasons why the leaders agreed upon a coalition was that they feared the inroads of Wood upon Filipino autonomy.

The first bone of contention between Wood and the coalition leaders was the selection of his cabinet. He insisted on naming his cabinet as he pleased. He announced that he would have a cabinet in which all parties would be represented. He would thus eliminate party responsibility in the Government. The coalition leaders were naturally opposed. They insisted that party responsibility must be assured and hence the cabinet must be chosen from the members of the party or parties controlling the legislature. After some months of discussion Wood yielded to the leaders. He eliminated the Democrata Party from participation in the cabinet. He appointed three Colectivista-Nacionalistas and retained two old Nacionalista members.

Another policy Wood had to tackle was the economic one. The previous regime had embarked on an ambitious economic scheme. It was predicated upon the proposition that there was not enough private capital in the islands, and to avoid too much domination by foreign corporations the Government should engage in enterprises which private capital could not or would not carry on. Development companies were established like the National Coal Company and the National Cement Company for the purpose of exploiting the natural resources of the country. A National Development Company was created, intended to be the mother company of every other development company and authorized to engage in business and agricultural enterprises which private individuals were yet unable to tackle. The Manila Railroad Company was bought from the English. A Philippine National Bank was established, controlled by the Government.

From the beginning Wood, as well as Secretary of War Weeks, expressed opposition to the Government's business activities. They wanted the Government to withdraw from business enterprise. One of the first proposals of Wood was to lease the Manila Railroad Company to a New York corporation. There were vigorous protests from all parts of the islands. The administration of the railroad was not a failure. On the contrary, it was a business success. In the last five years of private ownership, from 1912 to 1916, inclusive, the loss from operation was 769,657.74 pesos (a peso is half a dollar). From 1917 to 1921, inclusive, the first five years of government ownership and management, the profits of the road were 1,121,608.56 pesos. In 1922, from January to October, inclusive, the profits from operations were 2,090,606.53 pesos. Fortunately by law the Governor General could not sign the lease alone. The consent of the two presiding officers of the legislature was required. In obedience to popular demand, these two refused to sign the lease, and Wood—although he had all the papers ready for signature—had to withdraw the proposition.

Recently, he wanted to close the National Bank, which had financed most of the sugar mills of Negros, spending a great deal of its capital in their establishment and upkeep. Governor Wood was encouraged by the fact that the National Bank had been badly managed. He also wanted to sell the sugar mills to foreign investors. Again the people cried out. They do not want foreign capital to control their economic life. They do not want the National Bank closed. They do not want the sugar mills sold to foreign investors.

The fact that Wood had yielded several times to the leaders did not mean that he had changed his ideas as to how he would govern. He yielded only when the law did not clearly permit him to act alone. He still maintained the idea that he was the supreme administrator; he still claimed that his cabinet members were simply his agents. He would not agree that the cabinet should follow the policies of the legislature or its leaders. The broad discretion given by Harrison to his departmental secretaries was nullified.

The recent resignation, therefore, of the council of state and the Filipino members of the cabinet did not come as a surprise to those who knew the situation. In fact, much against their wishes the leaders tolerated Wood for more than a year simply because they thought that they could win him in favor of independence. It seemed that he had led them to believe that he was in favor of independence and that all he wanted was to establish "an efficient government"; once that was accomplished, he would be willing to testify to the American people that Philippine independence was the next thing in order. This must have been the reason why he was able to rule for more than a year and a half with a stern hand. But the leaders became skeptical as to his promises. They feared that his confidential promises for independence had for their main object to take back more and more power already granted by the previous Administration to the Filipino people, or their representatives.

The leaders, therefore, awaited an opportunity for a "show down." The case of Patrolman Conley of the Manila city police appeared to be such an opportunity. By the administrative code, a patrolman could be dismissed by the mayor with the approval of the secretary of the interior, both Filipinos. The two latter charged Conley with bribery. They failed to establish their case in court, but the judge said that Conley's conduct was not becoming a public officer and had justly created public distrust. Administratively, that would have been sufficient ground for discharge. But Wood stepped in and pronounced himself a defender of Conley. He had been suspended pending the trial, and Wood determined to reinstate him as against the desires of the mayor and the secretary of the interior. The secretary of the interior agreed to reinstate Conley under protest, but upon his reinstatement resigned. The mayor did not agree to reinstatement, and also resigned. The members of the cabinet and the council of state thought that it was time to show their objection to such interferences by the governor; hence their resignations.

That is a brief history of the recent political tempest in the Philippines. Will it blow over and leave Wood unscathed? Time—and Washington—will tell.

III. RUBBER

The third great aspect of the Philippine situation is Rubber—elusive and elastic rubber. Yes, rubber, and back of it are great manufacturing establishments in the United States. Their attitude is that of most American business men interested in the islands. American manufacturers are eagerly hunting for rubber. So far England has monopolized its production, and is willing to squeeze the last farthing from them. Congress has appropriated half a million dollars for the investigation of places where rubber can be grown and produced under American auspices, free from English control. Rubber is no longer an experiment in the Philippines, for in the island of Basilan there is a big plantation under American management which is producing the same quality that is produced in English colonies. But American capitalists fear independence. Secretary of War Weeks himself, according to a United Press dispatch, was reported as saying that American capitalists would be willing to invest in rubber in the Philippines if independence could be delayed for some reasonable time!

American papers in the Philippines even reproach the Filipinos for their apparent indifference or opposition to the investment of American capital in rubber plantations. They want the Philippines to cooperate with the United States. But by cooperation they probably mean exploitation for the benefit of the United States, to the detriment of independence. The Filipinos also want cooperation, but not exploitation. They do not want to cultivate rubber at the expense of independence.

After the protestations of disinterestedness from responsible Americans, it would seem awkward at this time, when the Filipinos have taken the word of America at face value, for any of them even to suggest the possibility of holding the Philippines a minute longer for the benefit of any class of Americans. Have they forgotten the vaunted promises of the late President McKinley that the Philippines were "ours not to exploit, but to develop, to civilize, to educate, to train in the science of self-government"; or the famous phrase of William H. Taft when he was Governor of the Philippines, that the "Philippines are for the Filipinos"; or the expression of President Wilson that "America is not the owner of the Philippines, but simply a trustee"; or the pledge of Congress itself when it passed the preamble of the Jones law declaring that it was "never the intention of the people of the United States, in the incipiency of the war with Spain, to make it a war of conquest or for territorial aggrandizement"? And now, will independence be delayed just because the rubber interests want to develop plantations in the Philippines?

At this time when the United States champions the cause of mutual understanding among peoples, of common councils, of round-table conferences to discuss and decide frankly and openly their mutual problems and differences, it does seem strange that she cannot pursue and act upon those very same principles in the Philippines. The Philippine Government sends missions to the United States, representing the people, with full powers and authorized by law to discuss all matters touching independence and the relationship with America. What these Philippine delegations receive is not even a frank conference, a round-table discussion, but evasive answers. The late President Harding told them he did not know when independence might come—how soon or how far distant. The Filipino people, through their legislature, insist that the condition required by Congress as a prerequisite to the granting of independence, to wit, the establishment of a stable government, has already been fulfilled by the people. This is not denied, and yet no step is taken toward the settlement of this problem, when every possible consideration—social, political, and economic—demands the earliest possible solution.

What is needed is not investigating committees to go to the Philippines. The Republican regime sent the Wood-Forbes mission. It returned facts suited to the ideas of Wood and Forbes. Should a Democratic Administration send a mission, it would find facts suited to democratic ideas. The vicious circle can continue forever. At this stage of Philippine development, investigating committees do more harm than good. What is wanted is an actual attempt at a statesmanly solution of the problem. No action can be statesmanly or can hope for a happy solution which ignores the fact that the Filipinos are already an organized people with a government representing them. They must, therefore, be dealt with through their organized Government. America herself has established that Government, representing and speaking for the whole people. A commission on independence has been created by the legislature with powers to discuss the problem with the United States. If that is not sufficient, the Filipinos have proposed, with the consent of the American Congress, to call a constitutional convention to discuss their future relations with America and to draft the constitution of the future Philippine republic.

Why should the American Government ignore these facts and insist on finding what Philippine Richard Roe and John Doe want by sending special missions to the islands? By what principle of government is it decreed that one or two men—no matter how God-gifted they may be—can better know the needs and represent the desires of eleven million people than the very officials whom the people themselves choose every three years in what Wood himself calls peaceful and orderly elections?

Why cannot the American Government appoint its own commission, composed of representative men from Congress and the executive departments, to meet with a similar representative commission of Filipinos and discuss the independence problem? If America is frank enough to say that she needs some products of the Philippines, that she would like to retain some harbors or naval stations, that she wants rubber plantations, I am sure that the Filipino people will not deny her any reasonable request short of the non-fulfilment of her pledge to them.

The Monroe Doctrine—Killed in Its Home

By ERNEST GRUENING

ON December 2, 1823, President James Monroe delivered to Congress a message in which he enunciated the principles which have come down to us as the Monroe Doctrine. Its one-hundredth anniversary is being made the occasion of a "restatement" of that doctrine by various public men. Elihu Root once remarked: "It must be remembered that not everything said or written by secretaries of state or even by presidents constitutes a national policy, or can enlarge or modify or diminish a national policy." But while the written and spoken words of our highest office-holders may not greatly change our national policy, their less conspicuous deeds often do. The sanctity of the Monroe Doctrine has, with minor variations, been pretty generally preserved in the spoken word of almost every President and Secretary of State for a century. Mr. Hughes's was made plain in his recent address before the American Bar Association. There was in the doctrine, he said, "no hint, much less threat, of aggression on our part."

> The policy of the Monroe Doctrine does not infringe upon the independence and sovereignty of other American states. Misconception upon this point is the only disturbing influence in our relations with Latin American states. . . . We desire the independence, the unimpaired sovereignty and political integrity, and the constantly increasing prosperity of the peoples of Latin America. . . . We covet no territory; we seek no conquest; the liberty we cherish for ourselves we desire for others; and we assert no rights for ourselves that we do not accord to others.

This position coincides fully with the intent of Monroe and of his Secretary of State, John Quincy Adams, who, more even than his chief, was the intellectual author of the Monroe Doctrine.

The doctrine was enunciated at a moment when Europe's reactionary forces had stifled revolutionary movements. Monarchism was enthroned and viewed the New World experiment with republican forms of government and democratic principles with as much alarm as Mr. Hughes now views the proletarian experiment of Russia. The European background of the Monroe Doctrine may be gauged by the provisions of the treaty adopted by the Congress of Verona in November, 1822, that "the system of representative government is as incompatible with the monarchical principles as the maxim of the sovereign people to the divine right"; and "it cannot be doubted that the liberty of the press is the most powerful means used by the pretended supporters of the rights of nations to the detriment of those of princes." With these premises the "high contracting powers" engaged mutually "in the most solemn manner to use all their efforts to put an end to the system of representative governments, in whatever country it may exist in Europe, and to prevent its being introduced in those countries where it is not yet known." Freedom of the press was also slated for a short shrift.

At that time most of the Latin American states were still struggling to free themselves from the Iberian yoke. Their independence had not yet been acknowledged. Were they to be reconquered the United States, still relatively feeble, would be menaced by Powers profoundly hostile to all our national experiment represented. The Monroe Doctrine, which has since become a national policy, was therefore embodied in the following passages of the President's message:

> In the wars of the European Powers in matters relating to themselves we have never taken any part, nor does it comport with our policy so to do. It is only when our rights are invaded or seriously menaced that we resent injuries or make preparation for our defense. With the movements in this hemisphere we are, of necessity, more immediately connected, and by causes which must be obvious to all enlightened and impartial observers. The political system of the allied Powers is essentially different in this respect from that of America. . . .
> We owe it, therefore, to candor, and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and those Powers, to declare that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety. With the existing colonies or dependencies of any European Power we have not interfered and shall not interfere. But with the governments who have declared their independence and maintained it, and whose independence we have, on great consideration and on just principles, acknowledged, we could not view any interposition for the purpose of oppressing them, or controlling in any other manner their destiny, by any European Power, in any other light than as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward the United States. . . .
> The occasion has been judged proper for asserting as a principle, in which the right and interests of the United States are involved, that the American continents, by the free and independent position which they have assumed and maintained, are henceforth not to be considered as subjects for future colonization by any European Power.

What was clearly implicit in this doctrine was that the United States believed in the right of peoples, however feeble, to declare themselves independent and to set up their own governments as they saw fit, precisely as had the thirteen colonies. Nor was there, despite our own abhorrence of reconquest by the medieval continental governments and our living apostolate for republicanism, a distaste for a monarchical government per se, provided it arose or seemed to arise from the will of the people. The Washington Government never shuddered at recognizing "Emperor" Iturbide as the first head of autonomous Mexico, and for three-quarters of a century maintained as friendly relations with the Brazilian empire as with neighboring republics. The idea which apparently dominated the men who had grown up in the atmosphere of "independence" was the national right to set oneself up in business politically and to remain safe from aggression. Mingled with this were economic motives, such as the desire for trade in this hemisphere.

Our essential attitude was expressed by Jefferson, who as early as July, 1791, in an instruction to Short, our minister to Spain, had written concerning our attitude toward alleged designs on the West Indies:

> Whenever jealousies are expressed as to any supposed view of ours, on the dominion of the West Indies, you cannot go farther than the truth in asserting that we have none. If there be one principle more deeply rooted than any other in the mind of every American, it is that we should have nothing to do with conquest.

This note has been repeatedly stressed throughout our foreign history. There have, it is true, been departures from it. The acquisition of Florida was a slight violation, but that territory was empty and had no established local or national aspirations. The taking of Mexican territory by the treaty of Guadalupe-Hidalgo was a thorough violation of the spirit of the Monroe Doctrine. Nevertheless, this doctrine was again invoked by Seward to force the withdrawal of the French armies keeping the Napoleon-imposed Hapsburg archduke, Maximilian, on the Mexican throne. Other minor departures from the Monroe Doctrine were the acknowledgment of British sovereignty over the Falkland Islands and over Belize, which, however, may fairly be said to have been controversial issues. In the Venezuelan dispute, Cleveland and Olney spiced the Monroe Doctrine with a new note of belligerency, the latter declaring: "Today the United States is practically sovereign on this continent, and its fiat is law upon the subjects to which it confines its interposition"; but our threat here was designed to prevent an encroachment, fancied or real, by Great Britain upon Venezuela. It was not a move from which the United States benefited directly, nor an implication of our right to use our power for selfish ends.

The Spanish War precipitated a radical departure from the Monroe tradition in that, for the first time, it interfered "with the existing colonies or dependencies of any European Power." In addition by taking Porto Rico we violated the idea of non-conquest. The Teller resolution stipulated our obligation to respect Cuba's integrity, but it is commonly accepted throughout Latin America that "free" Cuba is no more than an American colony.

From then on the United States veered rapidly away from the doctrine of James Monroe. Whatever may have been the departures from the policy in the first three-quarters of a century of its existence, they were occasional, unrelated, determined by special and peculiar conditions. In the last twenty years on the other hand they have increasingly become part of a fixed policy. President Roosevelt "took" the Panama Canal Zone, as he himself put it, "while Congress was discussing it." President Taft sent our marines to Nicaragua and they have been there ever since, holding in office a government which derives its sanction from the just consent of two American banking houses. President Wilson, who in his war message on April 2, 1917, declared that the United States was fighting "for democracy, for the right of all those who submit to authority to have a voice in their own government, for the rights and liberties of small nations," had conquered Haiti in 1915 and Santo Domingo in 1916 without sanction other than his own will. And in 1920 the Republican Party, while making through Mr. Harding a solemn preelection pledge to rectify this "wrong," has still further destroyed the vestiges of autonomy of the second-oldest independent nation in this hemisphere.

Mr. Hughes may declare solemnly, as he has before, that we have no intention of infringing on the sovereignty of our new Caribbean acquisitions. Yet an examination of the successive applications of force and trickery, culminating in the National City Bank's loan which rivets the occupation in Haiti at least until 1952, merely suggests the wide discrepancy between the words and deeds of our public servants. Indeed this curious dualism is the essence of the new policy. There is, on the one hand, the officially spoken denial that it exists; on the other, the evident fact of its steady progress. There is the solemn exchange of diplomatic courtesies in the grand manner of dealing between equal and sovereign nations; there is the smiling, cynical awareness of diplomatic officials and concession hunters revealed in private conversation. Beneath the white glove of official hand-clasping and behind the benevolent mask of friendly cooperation are the iron hand of military pressure and the hard features of the commercial exploiter.

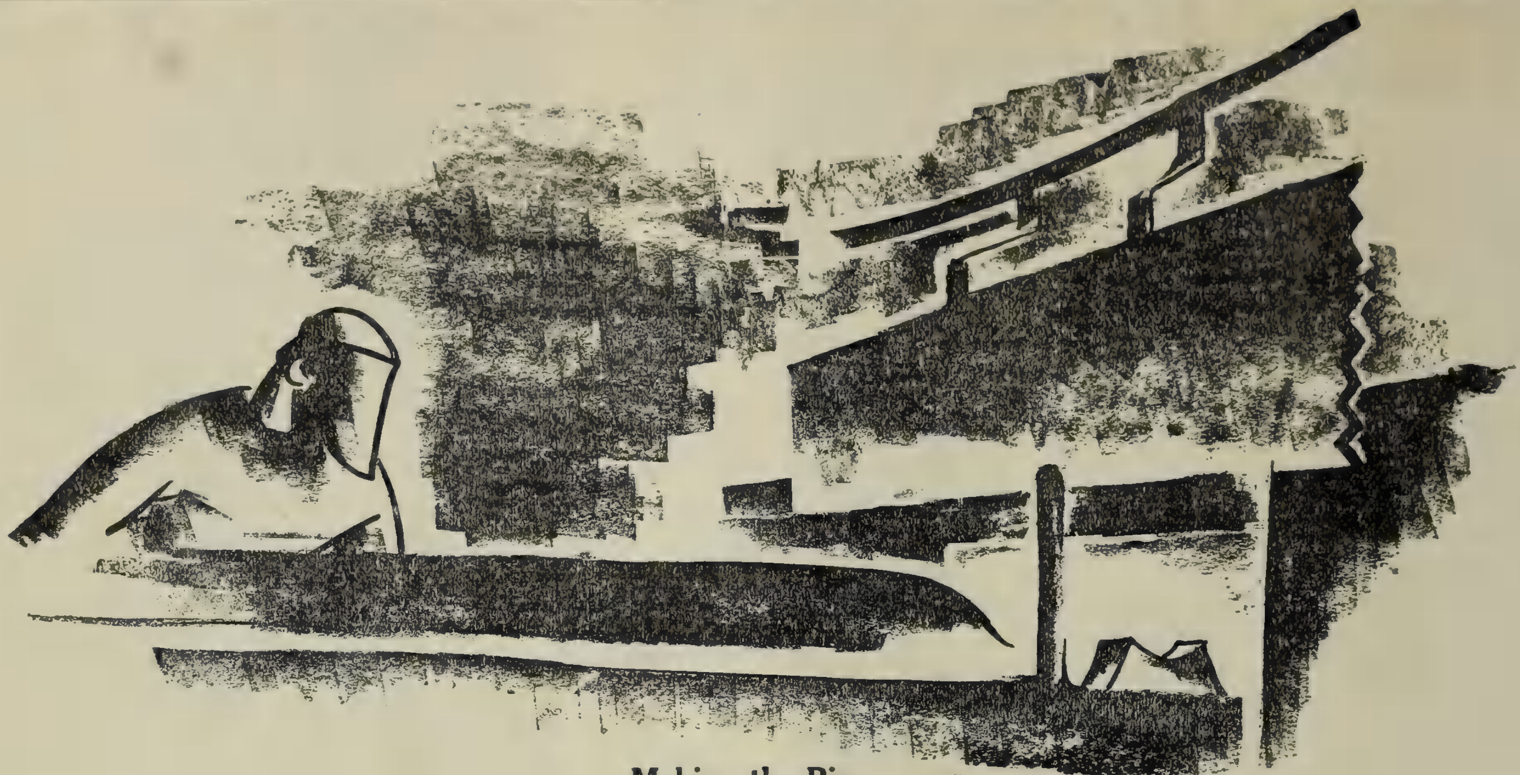
It is evident that the twentieth century has produced forms of conquest other than that exemplified by raising a national ensign and firing a salute. These newer forms of conquest were well defined by the late Walter Hines Page, who in a public address in London, referring to European conquest in this hemisphere, said:

> I sometimes read that the United States is entering upon a policy to discourage foreign investments there. That is untrue. . . . There is a policy forming in the minds of our Government . . . that would discourage such investments or concessions as would carry with them the control of the Government of any of those states, and only such . . . and they most heartily welcome your investments in any part of the Americas, provided only you do not make them so that you may possibly take the country with them. The Monroe Doctrine meant this, when it was first formulated: that the United States would object to any European governments taking more land in the New World. In those days the only way that a foreign government could gain land was literally to go and take it. Now we have more refined methods of exploitation, and there are other ways to take it. . . . You will, I am sure, understand why the United States prefers that no land in the New World should be acquired in these new, subtle ways. (Italics mine.)

These new and subtle ways permit the conquered to retain not a few trappings of autonomy: a flag; generally a president, as soon as the right man can be found; sometimes a legislature, if it legislates as it is told; courts, so long as their decisions do not interfere with foreign "development"; and always costumed ministers plenipotentiary, lovely postage stamps, and life-membership in the Pan-American Union. What could be freer than that?

Indeed, recently the new conquest has developed even newer and subtler ways. Our Dominican invasion reechoed from Ciudad Juarez to Punta Arenas. It was coarse work. The technique now is to maneuver a properly disposed government into power, negotiate with it a treaty which includes a loan guaranteed by customs control or other revenues and "concessions" which turn over the wealth of the country to American companies opportunely on the ground. Today, in varying degree, such arrangements exist with Salvador, Honduras, Costa Rica, Panama. An internal upheaval due to popular resentment against thus mortgaging the country has temporarily postponed their consummation in Guatemala. In South America Peru, Colombia, and Bolivia have virtually succumbed. Ecuador, Venezuela, Paraguay are next in line.

All this is contrary to the true spirit of the Monroe Doctrine, which to the extent that the United States adhered to it, served its original purpose well. It has probably prevented the conquest either wholly or in part of over half a hemisphere by England, France, Germany, and Portugal, which in a hundred years have taken over Africa and a large part of Asia. The Monroe Doctrine, though conceived in self-defense and beneficial to both our political and economic interests, was also altruistic; devoted to a principle that we still revere in theory and in our teachings, and based on a decent respect for the rights of others. The new galloping imperialism which attempts to find justification in the Monroe Doctrine is a violation of its spirit.



Making the Pipe

A Diary with Drawings

II

I MET a Hungarian who worked in these mills for years. He offered to guide me through the plant. Great electric cranes worked overhead, silently shifting tons of the long steel tube from one side of the iron structure to the other. Oblong-shaped furnaces made it hard to stand the heat even in the cold days of October. At one end of the oven they fed the long strips of steel cut for the size of the pipe. At the other end a masked man pinched it with a pair of extremely long pliers and hooked it to a revolving chain that dragged the pipe out. It cracked like a machine-gun and shot stars as it rubbed against the mold that forced it into shape. The man, illuminated by the red of the oven, went through a set of rhythmic movements that kept me watching him a long time. The tubes automatically slid into cooling channels and were piled up without a human hand touching them. Railroad cars that ran right into the mammoth workshop were loaded with tubes ready for shipment. The blast furnace with its graceful stoves standing guard on each side, the cars that crawled up to the top with the ore, the quaint architecture of the furnace, the intricate arrangement of its many tubes, made me think of a grand toy of some giant child rather than of an important instrument in the service of sober business. Under the surface of the earth below the furnace black-faced men filled the "toy cars" with ore. At the mouth of the furnace pale-faced men watched the course of the yellow liquid metal that filled the air with fumes of sulphur as it flowed through narrow ditches into the waiting tanks.

We had to unload a box car of cement. It took nearly all of the morning. The weight of the cement began to tell toward the last bags. I felt weak in the knees. The fine dust got through our shirts, our underwear, and made us dirty and uncomfortable.

After noon we returned to the cellar. We didn't work much. We tried to rest up after that load of cement. We sat in the dark and talked. One of the boys asked me to visit him at the Mexican Hotel. "Some of us are good singers and others have mandolins and guitars," said he, to induce me to come.

The Mexican Hotel at 103 Third Street is a one-story red brick building. I was astonished at the sight I beheld as I walked in. In a room 18 x 16 twenty-four men were quartered in double-decked beds. In the largest room, about 22 x 16, I counted thirty-two beds. And so in five rooms one hundred and thirty-six men slept and spent their spare time. More than 10 per cent of them were sick. The food served in the dingy dining-room was unfit to eat. The price was exorbitant. The National Tube Company imported over four hundred of these Mexicans. They distributed them in four different houses like the one I just described. The National Tube Company is solely responsible for the condition of these men. The authorities must know about this. But when it would be against the interest of big business, the hand of the law is slow.

The next morning found us in the brick shed. We had to unload a car of fire-proof brick. We filled our wheelbarrows and pushed them where men piled the brick into straight-edged oblongs. It was a windy morning and the wind stirred clouds of the dust in the shed. I resented working in that dust.

That afternoon the boss ordered one of the Mexicans and me into the box car. Our job was to get the bricks from the interior of the car and place them in rows to the opening, where the men could reach them. It was the worst job of all. The dust rose at the least disturbance; it filled my eyes, nose, and throat. Every few minutes I had to put my head through the opening to get a breath of the less dusty air. It was hard work, too. I felt irritable. My Mexican partner left me alone for a few minutes. I had to work doubly hard to keep the men supplied with bricks. I was less careful about placing the bricks in neat rows at the opening. I piled them any old way. The boss came. "Hey, you!" he yelled at me, "you put those bricks into straight rows!"

"I have no time," I answered.

"I'll give you your time!"

I was fired.

Saintsbury

By LUDWIG LEWISOHN

IT is time that a tribute be paid to George Saintsbury.* His audience, vast almost as that of a popular novelist, is not a grateful and, despite its official connection with literature, not an articulate one. How many wretched candidates for collegiate degrees, lower or higher, have not burned the oil of preexamination midnights in order to pore over a few, at least, of his ten thousand pages; how many teachers of English in innumerable institutions of all varieties and grades of what is euphemistically known as learning have not, innocent of all contact with the original documents, derived their pedagogical material and thus their bread and butter too from the pages of the "Short History of English Literature," the histories of Elizabethan and nineteenth-century literature, and even, if they aspired very high, the "History of English Prosody," the "History of Criticism," the "English Prose Rhythms," the "Periods of European Literature," the many and mighty editions of the giants that were before the flood. The works of George Saintsbury, a noble phalanx of volumes, have won a hundred obscure but vital battles; knowledge and wisdom have sat on their right hand and place and preferment on their left. Yet if, today, you ask the younger generation of the pundits concerning him you get but one answer: "But the man can't write worth a continental!"

It is perfectly true that Professor Saintsbury writes well in neither the older nor the newer sense. He is, heaven knows, neither a Swift nor a Pater, neither a Hazlitt nor an Arnold. But, in the first place, he has himself explained in a by no means ill-written passage that he is one whose ears, but not, alas, whose lips, the Muse has touched, and, in the second place, there is something ungenerous, finicky, and trifling in picking out cacophonous sentences from the works of a writer whose innumerable pages, though without grace, fine precision, high elegance, have the unfailing appeal of unaging vivacity, inexhaustible enthusiasm, delightful human warmth. I know of one reader, at least, a reader by no means insensitive to style, who has long read and still reads Saintsbury with pleasure, with profit, with amusement, and who would not give him up for a wilderness of Walter Raleighs or even Gilbert Chestertons, for costive preciosity or the passionate clamor of fools.

And this is true, it should be remarked, despite the fact that the reader in question differs irreconcilably from Professor Saintsbury on every issue of man's philosophical and active life. For Saintsbury is a tory, a magnificent and belligerent tory, a tory whose cocksureness, fortified by a formidable logical apparatus, has something at once amusing and sublime. If one wants toryism, here one will get it for one's money. Saintsbury is no Laodicean. In his toryism there is neither variableness nor shadow of turning. The evil modern "reign of shoddy" began with the first Reform Bill. Since then the world has been going straight to the devil. Leigh Hunt was quite properly sent to prison; all Irish discontent is the work of romantic young fools; a gentleman will consent to obey a king but not a mob; democracy is not only futile but downright foolish. In all these matters Saintsbury argues with logical correctness and amusing unfairness. He starts out with the assumption that these matters, intricate as organisms, desperate as death, are as plain as a pikestaff and as adjustable as nose-glasses. Thus, for instance, in his extremely witty and pertinent and at a dozen points sound "Thoughts on Republics" he quietly omits the crucial fact that all philosophical modern democrats from Mill to the present have been well aware of the fact that without the adequate and proportionate representation of every minority, however small, however perverse, the democratic experiment is indeed not only a joke but a bad joke. But the point is that you really don't want Saintsbury to be different. He is a survival, but a splendid one. Who but the grand old tory that he is could, a critic of literature by profession, have written his notes on a wine cellar or his noble and luscious essays on the cookery of the partridge and the grouse? Reading these exercitations one almost shares that nostalgia for the past which is at the romantic core of all his personal and political views and sighs, like himself, for an age of otium cum dignitate, of mighty trenchermen and merry consumers of toddy, of liquor and learning, of at least apparent order when the proletarian knew his place and the king was on his throne and the slave in his cotton-field and the Jew in his Ghetto. Yes, one shares his nostalgia for a moment until there creeps back the one thing the tory lacks—imaginative sympathy. For the tory would have to stop being a tory the moment he felt, felt what it must have been to be that proletarian, that slave, that Jew.

I have lingered over Professor Saintsbury's non-literary opinions and personality since I do not remember having ever seen a printed word on either. But the fact that he is an uncompromising romanticist by temper probably accounts for the freedom and soundness of his aesthetic judgments. For at this point he is consummate. Wherever his vast and varied and vital learning does not fail him, as it does, for instance, in German literature since Goethe, his literary appreciations are all but unrivaled. Test him at any point, in respect of any author in the whole range of ancient, of medieval, of modern English, French, and Italian literature, you will find his purely or almost purely impressionistic judgments practically unerring. Even in literatures that he knows ill he has but to come in contact with a document to see its value. He stumbled upon the diaries of Grillparzer and at once gave the Austrian dramatist his just place in the history of criticism. Nor has he ever, or, as he himself would say, scarcely ever, let his extra-literary prejudices color his critical views. He lets his altogether noble love of letters shine upon the just and the unjust. Hazlitt may have been an ill-tempered libertarian and Shelley a full-fledged Bolshevist. It does not matter to Professor Saintsbury. When it comes to beauty this tory knows no parties. Beauty is after all what he worships, and his toryism is nothing but terror lest the sum of beauty be diminished upon earth.

His highest service will be seen, I think, to have been his clarification of critical theory. He has carried the war against preceptist, absolutist, a priori criticism into the very academic towers and citadels where it was most strongly protected. His conservatism as a man and his equipment as a scholar gained him a hearing where all other voices would have been discredited. And in this central matter he has been tireless and fearless. No one has done more, no one has done as much, to establish the truth that in art there is no rule except that there is no rule, that creative expression is and must be free, and that only from a work itself can the rules by which it is to be judged be derived. And it is not without a tinge of irony that Professor Saintsbury seems to be and always to have been totally unaware of the fact that if he had ever permitted himself to transfer these views of his from one domain of the human spirit to any other the cloud-capped towers and palaces of his toryism would have faded at once like an insubstantial pageant and left not a rack behind.

In the Driftway

THE Drifter has often remarked that his esteemed colleagues know nothing of the realities of life. Occupying themselves, as they do, with public welfare, governments, social reform, and such illusory ideas, they are unable to recognize an important event when they see it. Every so often he feels obliged to check them up on the news of the day—the real news—which they almost invariably neglect. For example, the recent bequest of the late Mr. Nathaniel Rothschild to the British Museum, although the recipients of the gift were delighted beyond measure, received not a word of comment in this paper. Yet that bequest, the largest collection of fleas in the world, was probably closer to reality than twenty governments. Mr. Rothschild had obtained specimens of fleas from almost every living animal, including no doubt the genus homo; he is said to have financed an expedition to the Arctic regions for the sole purpose of obtaining a flea from an Arctic seal. What an opportunity for a dissertation on the virtues of persistence and courage, not only on the part of Mr. Rothschild but of the fleas themselves, who dared Arctic cold and sunless days but who on being brought to a warmer climate, the Drifter warrants, were as sprightly in jumping about from chair to carpet and back again as any of their more tropical relatives.

* * * * *

AGAIN, there is the story of the landlord in lower New York City who not only will not have a childless or even dogless family in his apartments, but who pays a bonus of $50 for every boy twin or triplet born on his premises and $25 for every girl. Now the Drifter is sure that if The Nation had made any comment on this matter at all, its words would have been words of praise and thanksgiving, whereas the Drifter considers this the rankest injustice that has been perpetrated for the last seven and a half years. Why any landlord should be permitted to indicate that boys are twice as valuable as girls is beyond him. Has the female sex disappeared, or is its well-known ability to defend its own members softening under the influence of suffrage and knickerbockers? At this rate, women will shortly be as spineless and docile as men. For his part, the Drifter is willing to start the controversy by saying that if triplet boys are worth $50, which he doubts, triplet girls are worth at least $50.98, and if the amount of dishwashing the poor little things will do while their brothers are off skylarking be taken into consideration, possibly the amount should be raised to an even $51.

* * * * *

IT may be, of course, that dishwashing for females is going out of fashion. The young lady from Illinois who holds the State record for corn-husking with eighty-four bushels in eleven hours would probably say so, and would moreover express herself in no uncertain terms about the $25 valuation for girls mentioned above. The Drifter's record in corn-husking, which he considers the hardest and most unworthy occupation ever invented by man, is so poor that he refuses to set it down. He feels that he would do better to challenge the champion lady corn-husker to a contest in sweeping the back porch; yet it is just possible that she, with the unhappy versatility of which women are so often possessed, might beat him at that also.

A Voice from 1870

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Mr. William H. Scheifley's review of Mr. F. A. Simpson's book ("Louis Napoleon and the Recovery of France"), which appeared in The Nation of August 22, was an agreeable surprise to me, as it revealed at last an historian who is fair to Napoleon III. Our French historians, influenced in spite of themselves and almost unconsciously by party hatreds, have generally been unjust to him—La Gorce, like all the others. My husband alone seems to have understood Napoleon III, and spoke with courage inspired by affection for that sovereign. Between him and Emile Ollivier were strong affinities of thought and nature. Both felt a deep interest in the laboring classes and wished to ameliorate their material and moral condition. They differed only as to the way to bring this about. My husband held that it could be accomplished by giving them liberty, the Emperor that it could best be done through a dictatorship. But a dictatorship, even when exercised in the most upright manner, cannot last long. Napoleon III finally perceived this, for as early as 1860, after some ten years on the throne, he introduced into his constitution reforms which started the empire on a more liberal course. Emile Ollivier knew that these reforms would have a necessary complement, and as he was a liberal as well as a democrat, he did all he could to aid the Emperor, even at the risk of breaking with his party friends who were bent more on overturning the empire, notwithstanding their oath of allegiance to it, than on broadening its base and improving it.

So it was that Emile Ollivier helped the Emperor get Parliament to pass the bill legalizing the organization of associations, to restore free speech, give more liberty to the press, etc. But the Emperor moved with circumspection in granting these reforms, for the idea of liberty seemed to frighten him, and this disposition was strengthened by the Empress and M. Rouher, his favorite minister. These two personages were in fact steering the ship of state at this moment, as the Emperor was then in very bad health, and they were not disposed to let go the rudder. But a bond of personal sympathy and an attraction arising from their similar ideas drew the sovereign and Emile Ollivier more and more closely together and finally decided the former to grant his subjects complete liberty. No other minister could have obtained from Napoleon III such a result. With Emile Ollivier as his mouthpiece, the Emperor decided, with loyalty and firmness, to establish a liberal Empire without other restrictions than those found necessary under all governments.

Nor did the Emperor and his minister part company when it came to foreign affairs. They were both advocates of the doctrine of nationalities, a sort of self-determination, to use the language of today, though Emile Ollivier accepted it only when it came with the wish and consent of the people concerned, whereas Napoleon III did not hesitate to impose it by arms if necessary. They worked for the unity of Italy in 1859 with our victorious troops, and again in 1866 by means of the Prussian armies, which, through the defeat of Austria, made possible the completion of Italian unity by the annexation of Venetia.

Emile Ollivier viewed with joy the total freedom of Italy but he saw with apprehension the discontent toward Germany which showed itself in France, even among the liberals, who, like Thiers, fanned in Parliament the embers of suspicion and irritation. The Emperor did not share these feelings, but the Empress did not hide her chauvinism, the intensity of which was increased by the fact that Emile Ollivier had persuaded the Emperor to agree that so long as Prussia took no step directed against French interests, we would let the principle of nationalities develop in Germany as it pleased. But the Hohenzollern candidacy, which would have placed a Prussian prince on the Spanish throne, that is, on our western frontier, was a move which threatened our safety and compelled us to demand of Prussia the abandonment of this plan. King William did so and peace seemed assured, until the Empress, requiring an inopportune guaranty for the future, gave Bismarck the chance to offend us in a way that could not be allowed to pass in silence. Hence the origin of the war of 1870.

Such are the reflections awakened in my mind by the review of Mr. Simpson's book. MARIE THERESE OLLIVIER

Collars for the Starving

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The following dispatch, dated Troy, New York, appeared in the Daily News Record of October 22:

"More than 13,000 dozen first-quality soft collars left Troy yesterday, consigned direct to the American Red Cross, Yokohama, Japan. Most all of the larger collar companies of the city have a share in this emergency order, which was placed by the Department of Commerce at Washington, acting for the American Red Cross there, through the office of the Association of Collar Manufacturers of Troy."

Is it possible that there is nothing that the Japanese need any more than collars? If so, it seems to me that they are in no great need of American assistance.

Women and Negroes Excluded

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your editorial comment on the exclusion of colored men by the Molders' Union and the exclusion of women by the Barbers' Union fails to mention that the Molders' Union also excludes women, not only from the union, but so far as possible from the trade. Unless the rule has been changed recently, union molders are prohibited under penalty of a heavy fine from teaching any part of their trade to women.

Men core-makers are eligible for membership in the Molders' Union, but the large number of women now employed in core-making are barred. Mr. Valentine, president of the Molders' Union and a vice-president of the A. F. of L., told me, with evident satisfaction, that he had obtained the discharge of a number of women core-makers by informing their employer that the union molders in the shop would not use cores made by women.

The Carpenters' Union also excludes women, thus shutting out thousands of workers in box factories and furniture factories. The policy of the A. F. of L. to which you referred, in refusing separate charters to women excluded from an international union, although it grants separate charters to colored men similarly excluded, affects women wood-workers and women core-makers, of course, as well as women barbers.

A Mischievous Movie

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: "The Famous Mrs. Fair," a moving picture dealing with the problem of the married woman who wants to earn money outside her home, made its appearance in Philadelphia under the chaperonage of the Civic Club. Invitations were sent to clubwomen asking them to be present at a private view of the movie and to express their opinions of it. The plot, briefly, is as follows:

Mrs. Fair, whose son Alan, aged 19, is serving with the American Army in France, takes up work in France with the Red Cross, making such a success that she is given the title of major and returns home to find herself a celebrity and in great demand for interviews, lecture appointments, etc. She accepts the offer of a lecture bureau to undertake a coast-to-coast lecture tour for the sum of $30,000. Her husband, who is opposed to such publicity and to so much outside activity, forbids her to sign the contract, but she does so. During her absence for a few months, husband, son, and the 17-year-old daughter, Sylvia, go to the bad. Her husband is involved in an affair with an adventuress, her son takes to poker and drink and is rescued by a little telephone operator who marries him. Sylvia is introduced to New York fast life by the manager of the lecture bureau, with whom she elopes. Mrs. Fair's return to her home for a short visit comes just in time to rescue her family.

Those who were active in the club movement and in the suffrage movement recognize the animus pervading this movie. The statement that woman's place is in the home and domestic happiness totters if she leaves it, even for a short time, is an old enemy that confronted the pioneer feminists at every turn. The efforts of women half a century ago to organize women's clubs and to obtain for women the right to speak in public and the right to vote were met by the same arguments set forth in this movie; though not nearly so politely expressed. Susan B. Anthony, Lucretia Mott, Antoinette Brown Blackwell, and other champions of women were received with the greatest insolence; in fact, with mob violence. Of late years the opposition has assumed another guise; for two reasons. Suffrage and women's clubs have arrived, and no one now objects to women lifting up their voices in public, if we will consent to do it gratis. It is significant that Mrs. Fair, the wife of a millionaire, is to be handsomely remunerated for her lectures. As the economic struggle becomes more intense and more women are driven out of their homes to earn a living, a corresponding reaction against this new competition arises among the men who have heretofore held these jobs. Everywhere we can see attempts to drive women back to the home; especially married women, on the supposition that their husbands are able and willing to support them.

And it is the married women who are seeking employment outside the household in ever-increasing multitudes! "In manufacturing and mechanical industries the number of married women employed increased 41 per cent during the ten years between 1910 and 1920, while the number of all women increased only 7 per cent," said Miss Mary N. Winslow of the Women's Bureau of the Department of Labor, speaking before the National Conference of Social Workers, May 21, in Washington. "There are 2,000,000 married women in the United States working for money."

This movie does not deal with the frivolous society woman who is neglecting her home to play bridge, nor does it concern itself with the underpaid scrubwoman, though she may be leaving her children at the risk of their burning to death on the cook stove. No, it is the well-paid lecturer who is the object of the attack. Anxiety on the part of the authors of the movie to prove their point leads them into many absurdities. Neither husband nor daughter suffers from Mrs. Fair's visit to France while doing Red Cross work, nor is it intimated that the son Alan might have contracted his tendencies to gambling and drink when with the army. So we must infer that there are two kinds of absence: one owing to patriotism, which is beneficial; the other owing to the desire of a woman for self-support and self-development, which is pernicious. It is all right for mother to leave husband and daughter to do Red Cross work, but all wrong for her to leave them in order to develop her career and earn money by her own efforts. It seems inconsistent that a woman as able as Mrs. Fair should not have arranged for some relative or friend to look after the Fair family, and it is not explained why a 17-year-old girl should be loafing at home, whether her mother was there or not, and why she was not sent to college. The double standard of morals is encouraged by the casual way in which Mr. Fair acknowledges to his wife his unfaithfulness during her brief lecture tour. "Now, my dear, don't be unreasonable—you went away and left me" is the soothing remark with which he tries to justify himself.

Moving pictures, plays, or novels with the reactionary tendencies of "The Famous Mrs. Fair" in a subtle and specious manner make the struggle for equality much more difficult, and handicap the National Woman's Party and other organizations which are working for freedom and the right to a modern existence for all women. It is a pity that the Civic Club, which was itself one of the pioneer clubs for women, should bring such a flimsy and reactionary moving picture to the public notice—by way, I suppose, of elevating popular taste.

Lest We Forget Hungary

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: May I suggest that in your appeal for aid to relieve the situation of German and Austrian institutions of science and art you include the Hungarian institutions? I was in Hungary this last summer and I was deeply impressed by the splendid effort Hungary is making to rehabilitate its institutions of higher learning and of creative art. I am sure that your appeal will be even stronger if Hungary is included. I hope that my suggestion may receive your favorable consideration.

Science in Jerusalem

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: On Mount Scopus overlooking Jerusalem, where two thousand years ago the legions of imperial Rome were encamped and where they besieged and finally captured the proud and rebellious capital of Judea, there is a crude stone marking the foundation of the Hebrew University—a foundation laid in 1918, while the roar of battle still shook the earth. Not far from this landmark stands a plain square building. This is the Grey Hill House, which has been acquired by the World Zionist Organization and which is now being altered and extended to shelter the laboratories of the Medical School of the Hebrew University.

Here will be carried on the research work in biochemistry and microbiology and in the tropical and semitropical epidemic and endemic diseases which take heavy toll of Palestine and the adjacent countries. The work for the establishment of the university is the most hopeful message I am now bringing out of Palestine. Unhampered by political interests, unfettered by sectarian prejudices, it will be fostered and maintained by the Jewish people, but it will belong to the whole world and its laboratories will be open to the talent and genius of every land. It will have the Hebrew language for its chief medium of expression, but no other tongue that has a message will be barred. The Hebrew University on Mount Scopus will be the challenge of Jewry to anti-Semitism—not a dreamer's vision, but a practical plan of practical idealists.

Already a large area of land has been acquired adjoining the Grey Hill House for the buildings and grounds of the university, and an X-ray institution has been established, equipped with the most scientific apparatus for the study and treatment of disease. Thousands of volumes on medical and kindred subjects have been sent to Jerusalem to form the nucleus of the university library.

It is a source of pride to reflect that the anti-malarial and anti-trachoma work in Palestine has been initiated by an American group, the Hadassah Medical Organization, while the ultimate success of this life-saving and health-saving work will be the result of the efforts of another American Jewish Physicians Committee, through the laboratories that this organization is now establishing on Mount Scopus.

Lettuce with Sugar and Cream

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The Drifter's regret at the disappearance from America of that dish of his boyhood, lettuce with sugar and thick cream, echoes here from the Juras to the Alps. Myself an American, I confess never to have met this confection, but I shall tell you where you can find it: you can find it in the land in which, I believe, it originated—Denmark. True, it is going the sad way of the old Danish peasant costumes, but it is to be discovered now and then (see if Dr. Egan doesn't say so) where they are: in outlying villages—and occasionally, I suspect, at secret night in Copenhagen houses owned by those who, throughout the day, pretend to be advanced beyond the menus of their excellent grandsires.

Political Prisoners in the Rhineland and the Ruhr

By KUNO FRANCKE

AN editorial on the Ruhr occupation in the May number of the North American Review presents the following picture of the conduct of the French in the invaded territory:

> One of the achievements of great significance and moral value, thus far to be credited to the French occupation of the Ruhr, is the fine vindication of France herself. The inexorable resolution with which she entered upon that policy has been fully matched by the moderation, the self-restraint, even the considerate kindness toward the vanquished which have marked her execution of it. In striking contrast to the swaggering brutality of the German army of occupation after the war of 1870-71, the French have borne themselves with a courtesy and clemency, even in the face of atrocious provocation, such as probably no other people have ever shown in like circumstances. The most impressive testimony to this effect has been given by the Germans of the Ruhr themselves, who have generally acquiesced in the occupation, save as they were incited from Berlin to commit murders and other outrages.

In presenting a picture somewhat different from this glorification of the humane methods and aims pursued by the French in occupying the Ruhr, I shall not enter into the right or wrong of the Ruhr occupation itself. This question seems to me to have been settled by the note of the British Government of August 11, 1923, affirming its illegality under the Treaty of Versailles. Nor shall I enumerate the frequent acts of murder and other outrages committed by the French and Belgian troops in the Ruhr and Rhineland ever since the invasion was undertaken. These acts were the natural concomitants of a policy of military aggression. What I am going to speak about is a question of the administration of justice in the invaded territory, the question: What has been the fate of the hundreds of German citizens who upon one charge or another were arrested by the French or Belgian authorities? How were they treated when arrested? How were they brought to trial? What was their lot in prison?

The material from which I have drawn is all documentary, consisting either of official reports of representatives of the German Red Cross sent out to study prison conditions in the occupied territory or of sworn statements of prisoners made before the regular German courts or other authorities. I owe this material to the courtesy of the president of the German Red Cross, Herr von Winterfeld, and his assistant, Herr von Esebeck. It would have been easy to multiply the cases by scores and scores. The few cases selected by me from the large mass of material placed at my disposal stand each for a numerous class of similar cases, and together are typical of the whole situation.

I shall present the subject under four main heads: First, reports about French prison management in general. Second, reports about the treatment of hostages imprisoned in reprisal for actual or alleged acts of German sabotage. Third, sworn statements of persons arrested, but released without trial. Fourth, sworn statements of persons arrested, tried, and imprisoned for shorter or longer terms. I have taken care to rule out testimony violently partisan or replete with resentment. If I have erred, I have erred by giving preference to testimony of marked moderation and restraint.

For a general report on prison conditions under French rule, I select a comparatively favorable statement made to a Red Cross representative by former inmates of the prison at Germersheim in the Bavarian Palatinate. This statement was made at the request of the prisoners still there, since they had no chance to talk with the Red Cross representative except in the presence of the French prison officials. The chief points of this statement, dated June 2, 1923, are the following: The individual treatment of the prisoners in Germersheim is better than elsewhere. Nevertheless, there is much room for improvement in the general management. In particular, the food is entirely inadequate. The Red Cross is allowed to furnish two pounds of bread per week to each person, but this amount is deducted from the daily prison ration. It often happens that the Moroccan prison guards before the very eyes of the prisoners skim off the meager fat from their soup. The table utensils are usually dirty. In consequence of undernourishment, 70 to 80 per cent of the prisoners are virtually ill. Nevertheless, it rarely happens that a prisoner petitions to be placed on the sick list, since that usually leads to a still further reduction of food, prohibition of the daily walk, and similar retrenchments. The sanitary conditions are extremely bad. On account of the overcrowding of the prison, the shower bath can be used by a given individual only at long weeks' intervals. Instead of being allowed to use the lavatory, the prisoners must attend to their evacuations within their cells, in pails with loose covers. Of visitors, only relatives bearing the same family name are generally admitted; others have the greatest difficulty in securing admission. The prisoners resent the fact that food, clothing, and books sent by the Red Cross are distributed by the guards not only among the political prisoners, but equally and often preferably among the criminals imprisoned in the same building.

As particulars of prison life will fully come to light in the account of individual experiences which I shall cite later, I shall refrain from dwelling on other reports of a general character. I rather proceed at once to a specific and particularly aggravating account of French prison management, an account of how German hostages, i. e., citizens arrested in order to bring pressure upon a whole community, are treated under French military prison rule. During the night of June 29-30, 1923, a very deplorable disaster happened on the railway bridge crossing the Rhine near the city of Duisburg: an explosion on a Belgian military train, killing and wounding scores of soldiers. The cause of the explosion was obscure. The railway track was practically undamaged, no suspicious person had been seen on it. On the other hand, the train had carried ammunition; this ammunition exploded—was it not well to investigate whether the explosion had come from within or without? The French commandant of Duisburg did not think so; he was certain that it had come from without, that this was a case of German conspiracy, that the city of Duisburg was implicated and must be punished for the crime. The chairman of the local Duisburg Red Cross committee, under date of July 7, reports: > during the night of June 29-30, more than twenty prominent citizens of Duisburg have been arrested as hostages by the military authorities and have been quartered in the Duisburg court prison. These hostages are deprived of all advantages, even the smallest, which are accorded even to criminal prisoners arrested on whatever charge. Although the hostages have now been kept in prison for a whole week, they have not, like the other prisoners, been allowed a daily walk in the prison courtyard. The denial of this small chance for exercise, ordinarily granted to even the worst criminals, affects the hostages all the more terribly since they have been crowded with other prisoners, three, even four, together, into single cells, meant only for one person, so that even within their cells they have hardly any chance to move about. The air in these cells is intolerable, all the more so since all the inmates must attend to their evacuations in the cell. The hostages are entirely separated from the outer world. No relative, no clergyman, no representative of the Red Cross is allowed to see them. Only the prison physician is admitted to the sick among them, and this only in the presence of a Belgian guard. The hostages are not allowed to receive fresh underclothing from relatives. They are not allowed to do any reading.

> In consequence of the deplorable event on the Hochfeld bridge

> It is a clear demand of humanity that the hostages, who belong to the foremost families of the city and are mostly of advanced age, should not, by being treated worse than criminal prisoners, be made to suffer intolerable physical and mental tortures. This demand of humanity is all the more urgent since the hostages, in common with the whole Duisburg community, most severely condemn the crime of the night of June 29-30, if it was a crime, and not an accident, and would have done everything in their power to prevent it if they had had the slightest inkling of it. (Signed) STEINBACK,
> Chairman, Red Cross Committee for the Care of Prisoners.

I now pass on to sworn statements of persons arrested by French or Belgian soldiers, taken to guard-houses, but soon released without trial. To judge from the large number of such statements collected by the Red Cross—they run into the hundreds—such arrests and speedy releases belonged for months to the daily occurrences in the Ruhr. Whether they are as frequent now I cannot tell. The main point in all these cases is not the arrest itself or the subsequent release, but the way in which the victims were treated in the interval by the French and Belgian soldiery. From a mass of similar cases I select a few belonging to the months of February and March. They are almost monotonous in the repetition of the same revolting details.*

Police Officer Fritz Voss of Recklinghausen testified before the Recklinghausen District Court on February 12, 1923, under oath, as follows:

> February 7, toward 11 p.m., I was on my round in Haltern Street. At the corner of Spring Street I was halted by a French guard. I was accompanied by Police Officer Stermans. In front of us some civilians were walking, one of whom called out: "Deutschland, Deutschland über Alles!" I was accused of having sung: "Deutschland, Deutschland über Alles," which was not the case. I was taken to the Churchyard School, where a French Alpine chasseur thrust me into the guard-room. Several civilians were already there. I was told to stand in the corner, away from the civilians. After about ten minutes two non-commissioned officers appeared and told me to step into the middle of the room. They then belabored me with kicks and fisticuffs without giving any reason for it. Only one of them said in a questioning tone: "Deutschland, Deutschland über Alles?" With that he knocked me down on the floor, and then said: "Deutschland, Deutschland unter Alles!" Then the other soldier lifted me up and kept on maltreating me, kicking me in my back and sides and beating me with his fist in the face, so that I almost lost my hearing. Even now it is hard for me to hear. Then I was told to stand in the corner again. A broom was pressed into my hand and I was told to sweep the room, while they called out at me: "Capitalist! Nationalist!" The room was also a place of detention for arrested French soldiers. These looked on while I was being maltreated, laughed and clapped their hands. Meanwhile Police Officers Stermans, Ficht, and Pauli had also been brought in. We were ordered to sit on the bare, dirty floor. This we did and finally we stretched out for sleep. Only in the morning of February 8 about 10 o'clock my papers were examined. About 5 p.m. three mining students were brought in. These were placed with the face against the wall and had to stand at attention. As soon as any one of them moved a foot, the guard standing behind them knocked him with the butt of his gun against the legs. At 7 p.m. I and the other police officers were dismissed. The officer who discharged us told us to keep our mouths shut.

The following is sworn testimony of a Bochum railway official, Ludwig Rübsamen, made at the Bochum Court March 8:

> Sunday morning about 9 o'clock a troop of 15 to 20 French soldiers and two French civilians appeared at my house. They asked whether I was yardmaster R., and when I answered in the affirmative, they arrested me, shouting: "Sabotage, sabotage!" A search of my house and office yielded a receipt from the railway administration at Hanover for plans and maps sent by me there. At this there arose again the shout: "Sabotage!" I was led out of the house and was put in shackles on the street. In front of Section 37 of the Bochum railway yard there stood some boxes belonging to the yard which had been dug out by the French on that spot. What their contents were, I could not ascertain. The French pointed at the boxes and again shouted: "Sabotage!" At the same time a French civilian knocked me with a heavy stick over the temple so that I toppled over. Then the troop took me to the square in front of the railway station, where I was left standing, guarded by soldiers, until 12 o'clock. At that time an auto-truck, containing the aforesaid boxes, drew up and took me to the Oberrealschule. Here I was brought before an officer, who examined me as to my identity. Then, after having been locked up in the cellar for some time, I was brought before a French civilian official, who examined me again, took my finger-prints, and put down my statement that I knew nothing whatever about the burying of the boxes. I was then taken by auto, with three other prisoners, to Weitmar, near Bochum. In Weitmar I was locked up with three others in a single cell. Then, being handcuffed once more, I was taken to a private house for still another examination. During this examination, in which I could only repeat my former statement that I knew nothing about the boxes, a French civilian, standing behind me, in order to force some confession out of me, repeatedly struck me over the head with a heavy stick. At this, some French civilians present said: "This is not the way to treat decent people," and indignantly left the room. Next morning there was still another examination, again leading to nothing. Then I was provisionally discharged, without apologies for the injuries received, and with the warning that, if further excavations of the military authorities should bring more objects to light, my wife would be expelled without any of her household belongings and I would be rearrested.

Two more such cases of unprovoked arrests and serious maltreatments may briefly be referred to. On March 7 a sixteen-year-old pupil of the Oberrealschule at Recklinghausen, Ferdinand Rasch, was knocked down on the street by French Alpine chasseurs on the groundless allegation of having distributed pamphlets. For some time he lay unconscious. When he regained consciousness, he found him-

To the Readers of The Nation:

The economic breakdown of Germany endangers the efficiency, in many cases the existence, of the German schools. As a result of this the prospect of the rise of a new generation, intellectually and morally strong, is becoming a matter of grave concern. From all sides we hear the cry that not only the life of the nation must be saved but that its children must be raised to become useful and good men and women.

For this reason it is incumbent upon us to give help to the schools; to provide the children with indispensable materials, and to keep up the intellectual and moral life of the teachers by preventing their isolation from all intellectual intercourse with the rest of the world, and by placing them so that their physical needs do not make impossible devotion to their duty. Such assistance to the intellectual middle class is greatly needed at this moment.

We must furnish food, paper, pencils, ink, books and other indispensable material for study for pupils and teachers. You or your parents or some of your intimate friends may have attended a school in Germany. Will you not help in an organized effort to maintain the efficiency of that school by sending a contribution for its benefit?

This plan has been discussed with the governments of the German Reich and of the German states and information is being collected from the schools in regard to their most urgent needs.

It is our task, meanwhile, to raise the funds which Germany cannot provide at present. On account of the multifarious needs, organization and concentration of effort are necessary.

Any contribution made to a special school will be credited to the donor and acknowledged by the school.

We are hoping for a liberal response to our appeal.

self in the guard-room of the city hall. He was pressed by questions; and, not being able to make any revelation, he was knocked over the head, pounded in the face, spat at, thrown on the floor. Thus he was left for the night. Early in the morning he managed to escape. About 12 o'clock in the night of March 20-21 Professor H., in crossing the Lippe bridge at Dorsten was halted by Belgian guards and asked for his passport. While the Belgians examined his papers, a French customs inspector stepped up, took the papers from the Belgians, read them by the light of a street lantern, and exclaiming: "Ah, Professor!" suddenly struck Professor H., with his fist on the left eye, knocking him down thereby. Having pulled himself together again, the professor was led into the guard-house of the bridge, where the Belgian soldiers present fell upon him and mercilessly maltreated him. Later he was taken to the Duisburg prison, but, since nothing could be found against him, discharged. A medical examination showed that he had lost the sight of his left eye.

I shall close with a category of testimonies which is perhaps the most damaging of all, since in these cases even the excitement of the moment cannot be adduced as a mitigating circumstance for cruel treatment: testimonies of persons, sentenced to longer or shorter terms of imprisonment, about their experiences during the transport to the prison and their daily prison routine.

On March 27, before the French military court at Düsseldorf, Postmaster Trümpler of Hückeswagen, a little town south of Elberfeld, was tried for disobedience to military orders. Wherein this disobedience consisted, I have no means of finding. Judging from other trials of post-office officials for "disobedience," he may have refused to attend to mail matters for the French. At any rate no criminal act was involved. At the trial, Trümpler declared that as a man of honor and as a German official he could not have acted otherwise. The French public prosecutor designated the case as slight and asked for one month imprisonment and a fine of 300,000 marks. The court, however, fixed the sentence at three months and 600,000 marks. From here on I give Trümpler's story in his own words:

On April 2, i.e., six days after the trial, which I spent in the military prison at Düsseldorf, I was called at 4 o'clock a.m. and told to get ready for the transport to Zweibrücken (in the Bavarian Palatinate). With about forty-five other prisoners, three each of whom were manacled together, I was taken in an auto-truck escorted by Moroccan soldiers to the station and there placed in a third-class railway coach. About 6 o'clock the train started. We went via Düren, Euskirchen, Bonn, etc., with long stops at each station, and reached Mainz at 10:30 p.m., where the escort, consisting of gendarmes and infantry, changed. Here our chains were taken off. We had worn them uninterruptedly during the whole trip, a circumstance which made locomotion, eating, etc., very difficult and, for instance, forced each manacled trio to go together if one of them had to go to the closet. The food which we received during the trip had been arranged for by the Düsseldorf Red Cross. We reached Ludwigshafen at midnight and stayed there till 9:30 next morning, crowded together in such a manner that there was no chance for sleep. In Neustadt and Landau there were again stops of several hours. In Landau the French train people called a crowd of black soldiers to our coach, pointed us out to them, and joined with them in making fun of us. At 9 p.m. we reached Zweibrücken. Escorted by black soldiers, we were marched, in spite of our heavy luggage, at a very quick gait, to the prison. When on the way I translated an order of the French gendarme marching at our side to a prisoner ahead of me, the gendarme gave me a violent fisticuff in the neck. Drenched with perspiration I arrived at the prison. Here we were most ignominiously accosted by the French guards and distributed among the cells. In front of them we were stripped to our shirts, searched, and then thrust into the unlighted rooms. Our baggage and our clothes remained lying outside.

I got with four others into a cell, entirely dark and very cold. The window was open, and as we could not see enough to find out what the mechanism of closing it was, we had to leave it open. I stumbled upon a bedstead with a seaweed mattress, which, as I saw the next day, was soiled all over with blood stains. Except a short, ragged, diaphanously thin blanket, there was nothing on it. During the last part of the trip we had greatly suffered from thirst. In the cell there was not a drop of water. I was shaking with cold and, like my comrades, slept next to nothing. The next forenoon about 11 o'clock, some eatables were handed to us through the shutter of the door: boiled potatoes, with a small piece of boiled beef, entirely oversalted, and a piece of bread. In the afternoon, about three, we were told to step in front of the cell to have our things searched once more. Everything of our belongings was taken away, except the clothes themselves and a pillow, blanket, and some food which the Red Cross had furnished for our trip. These were thrown at our feet with contemptuous gestures. Then, for the first time, we got water for drinking and washing, but in dirty vessels. Towels we got only a fortnight later through the Red Cross. In the closet there was only a broken piece of a cover, so that an intolerable stench spread in our cell. An old convict jacket, which we found in the cell and fastened over the seat of the closet, was taken away by the guards with insulting remarks. Later in the afternoon of the same day we received some rice soup and a piece of bread.

Early the next day the shutter was suddenly opened. As we did not immediately stand at attention, we were told that we were not going to get any coffee and in case of repetition would never get anything but bread and water; whereupon the shutter flung back again. Later on we did get coffee regularly in the morning. But the daily food ration remained entirely inadequate throughout and the meals were often so revolting that both in the forenoon and the afternoon nothing could be done with it except pour it into the closet, so that actually we often lived for days together on dry bread and water. From fellow-prisoners I heard that the cooking was done by Moroccans.

On April 20—I had meanwhile been transferred to a cell with nine inmates—I was attacked by violent diarrhea. I did not care to report to the French physician, because he had treated other prisoners with disdain and neglect and even designated them as makebeliefs. A few days later a German physician was admitted. So, on April 24, I reported to him. He recognized my case as dysentery and promised to see to it that I would be given sick diet and be transferred to a hospital. The next day I received sick diet through the Red Cross, but the transfer to a hospital came to nothing, the prison administration objecting to it. After two days, during which I had to use the same closet vessel with my eight cell comrades, I was placed in a single cell. Here I had my meals in common with a diphtheritic patient. Once we had to eat from the same dish; once, in consequence of neglect by the guards, we were for twenty-four hours without food. A little night vessel, entirely inadequate for a proper and sanitary evacuation, served as a closet in this cell. This I had to rinse myself in the common sink. After three weeks, during which I received good Red Cross diet, my bowels improved. From that time on I was permitted to have the regular Red Cross fare accorded to convalescents above fifty years of age.

It should be added that general prison conditions had improved at this time, due to representations made by the

Established 1891.

The oldest English Socialist journal published in the United States.

The WEEKLY PEOPLE is America's leading Socialist weekly. It is a complete Socialist and Labor paper, publishing all the essential labor news. Its editorials interpret this news from the standpoint of Marxism. Uncompromising and fearless, criticizing Labor's errors with absolute independence. In emphatic, incisive language it exposes and condemns the inhuman system of society which renders one class the slave class of another—the system that withers all that is truly beautiful, that tends to corrupt what is pure in humanity, polluting at their very source all channels of enlightenment.

Contains regular features: "World News in Brief," Book Reviews, "Songs of Protest and Progress," Passing Comments, a republished "Daniel De Leon Editorial" in each number, a correspondence column, etc., etc.

NOTE

In the issue of December 1st:

"At the Bier of The Call"

This is a hitherto unpublished editorial written by Daniel De Leon. It is a powerful study in Socialist journalism.

The appearance and disappearance of such papers as The Call, The Leader, etc., call attention to the fact that something more is required of a Socialist and Labor journal than to imitate the capitalist journals.

Swedish Red Cross, a commission of Quakers, the Papal Nuncio in Munich, and the Protestant Consistory of Bavaria, who had all visited and inspected the Zweibrücken prison.

On June 11, at three o'clock in the morning, I was taken by a gendarme to the railway station, and thence via Landau to Germersheim. There the gendarme led me across the Rhine bridge and dismissed me, saying that I was expelled from the occupied territory. My question whether I was to have this order in writing was answered in the negative.

I am not one of those who fight hatred with hatred. I belong to those who believe that only by toleration and reason can moral progress in the relation between nations as well as individuals be achieved. As a believer in toleration and reason I deplore the seeds of hatred which France has been sowing and is now sowing in the Ruhr and the Rhineland. What can be achieved by a policy of toleration and reason is strikingly proved by the friendly feelings and sincere regrets with which the Rhineland population accompanied the departure of the American troops of occupation early this year. Now there is a chance for American public opinion to be of still greater service to the cause of toleration and reason by helping to put an end to this vicious and ruinous policy of hatred in the Ruhr and Rhineland.

A Thousand Years Ago

Chinese Translations by Witter Bynner and Kiang Kang-hu

A Farewell to a Militarist

By LIU CHANG-CH'ING

Sad wanderer, once you conquered the South
Leading a hundred thousand troops;
Today, dismissed and dispossessed
An old man, you remember your glory.
Once, when you stood, three borders were still;
And how little life mattered, your dagger well knows.
Now, watching the mighty Kiang and Han
On their ways in the evening, where do you go?

Drum-Beats

By LU LUN

Far off in the clouds, the walls of Han-yang
Lie a day's journey for my single sail.
Though a river-merchant ought to be sleeping in calm weather,
He hears the tide at night and voices of the boatmen. . . .
My thin hair grows wintry, like the three Hsiang streams,
Homesick, for ten thousand li my heart follows the moon;
But the war has left me nothing of my heritage—
And O this pang of drum-beats on the river!

The Imperial Conference

By LI SHANG-YIN

When the Emperor held conference with scholars, with exiles,
He found no calmer wisdom than that of young Chia
And gave him the foremost council-seat at midnight
But consulted him, alas, about higher things than people.

To My Brothers and Sisters Adrift in Troubled Times This Poem of the Moon

By PO CHÜ-YI

(Since the disorders in Ho-nan and the famine in Küan, my brothers and sisters have been scattered. Looking at the moon, I express my thoughts in this poem, which I send to my eldest brother at Fou-liang, my seventh brother at Yü-ch'ien, my fifteenth brother at Wu-chiang, and my younger brothers and sisters at Hsia-kuêi.)

My heritage lost through disorder and famine,
My brothers and sisters flung eastward and westward,
My fields and gardens wrecked by the war,
My own flesh and blood become scum of the street,
I moan to my shadow like a lone-wandering wild-goose,
I am torn from my root like a water-plant in autumn:
I gaze at the moon and my tears run down
For hearts, in five places, all sick with one wish.

The Simplest Way

By LIU TSUNG-YÜAN

I clean my teeth in water drawn from a cold well;
And while I brush my clothes, I purify my mind;
Then, slowly turning pages in the Tree-leaf Book,
I recite, along the path to the eastern shelter.
The world has forgotten the true fountain of this Teaching
And people enslave themselves to miracles and fables.
Under the given words, I want the essential meaning,
I look for the simplest way to sow and reap my nature.
Here in the quiet of the priest's temple-courtyard,
Mosses add their climbing color to the thick bamboo;
And now comes the sun, out of mist and fog,
And pines, that seem to be new-bathed;
And everything is gone from me, speech goes, and reading,
Leaving the single unison.

Forever

By LIU CHUNG-YUNG

For years, with our hands on our horse-whips and sword-hilts
To guard the Jade Pass and the River of Gold,
We have watched the green graves change to snow
And the Yellow Stream ring the Black Mountain forever.

Blacktail Row

By LIU YÜ-HSI

Grass has run wild now by the Bridge of Red-Birds;
And wings, at sunset, in Blacktail Row
Where once they visited Wang and Shieh,
Dip among doorways of the poor.

An Exile Recalled

By LIU CHANG-CH'ING

Dare I, at my age, accept my summons,
Knowing of the world's ways only wine and song? . . .
Over the moon-tipped river come wild-geese from the Huns;
And the thinner the leaves in Huai, the wider the mountains in Ch'u. . . .
I ought to be glad to take my old bones back to the Islands of Heaven,
But what in the world am I good for, with a few white hairs? . . .
As bent and decrepit as you are, I am ashamed to thank you
When you caution me that I may encounter thunderbolts.

The Islands of Heaven mean the Capital, to which the poet is recalled from Chiang-chou (now Kiukiang), and from which he had been previously exiled because of a storm he had aroused by too freely expressing his own ideas.

An Old Fisherman

By LIU TSUNG-YÜAN

An old fisherman spent the night there, under the western cliff,
Dipped up water from the pure Hsiang, kindled the Ch'u bamboos;
And then, at sunrise, he had vanished, through cloven mist,
With only the creak of his paddle left, in the greenness of mountain and river. . . .
I turn and see the waves moving as from heaven
And clouds above the cliffs coming idly, one by one.

Three Score and Ten

By MÊNG HAO-JAN

While worldly matters take their turn,
Ancient, modern, to and fro,
Rivers and mountains are changeless in glory:
We have come as witnesses . . .
Where a fisher-boat dips by a waterfall,
Where the air grows colder, deep in the valley,
The monument of Yang remains:
We have read it and have cried.

A Political Prisoner

By LO PIN-WANG

While the year sinks westward, I hear a cicada
Sing what I am thinking under my southern cap:
It has taken the song of those black wings
To break a white-haired prisoner's heart. . . .
For now that he has flown off, heavy through the mist,
And his clean voice drowns in the windy world,
Who knows if he be singing still?
Or listens any more to me?

A prisoner from the south would wear all of the northern prison-garb but keep his own cap to remember his own land. And the phrase "southern cap" has come to symbolize a political prisoner, with the implication that he maintains his ideas. This prisoner, for instance, cannot make his pure thoughts heard by the Emperor through the noise of the confused world.

From the City-Tower of Liu-Chou a Poem to My Four Fellow-Officials Chang, Ting, Fêng, and Lien

By LIU TSUNG-YÜAN

At this lofty tower where the town ends, wilderness begins;
And our longing has as far to go as the ocean or the sky. . . .
Hibiscus, by the moat, heaves in a sudden wind
And vines along the wall are whipped with slanting rain.
Nothing for ten thousand li but a blur of woods and mountain
And the river's nine loops twisting in our bowels. . . .
This is where they have sent us, this land of tattooed people—
And not even letters, to keep in touch with home.

A Farewell to Li Tuan

By LU LUN

By the old gate, among yellowing grasses,
Still we linger, sick at heart.
The path you are taking through cold clouds
Will lead you into evening-snow . . . .
Your father died and you left home young,
And I met you too late to avert your misfortunes.
We cry without words. What can I wish you,
In this blowing wintry world?

Dwelling by a Stream

By LIU TSUNG-YÜAN

I long have been hampered by official hat and robe
And am glad of exile to this wild southern district.
I am a neighbor now of farmers and planters,
I am a guest of the mountains and woods.
I plow in the morning, turning dewy grasses,
And at evening tie my fisher-boat, breaking the quiet stream.
Back and forth I go, scarcely meeting anyone,
And sing a long poem and gaze at the blue Ch'u sky.

Stopping at a Friend's Farm-House

By MÊNG HAO-JAN

Preparing me chicken and rice, old friend,
You entertain me at your farm.
We watch the green trees that circle your village
And the pale blue of outlying mountains.
We open your window over garden and field,
To talk mulberry and hemp with our cups in our hands.
Wait till the ninth day of the ninth month—
I am coming again in chrysanthemum time.

To My Retired Friend Wêi the Eighth-Born

By TU FU

It is almost as hard for friends to meet
As for the morning and evening stars.
Tonight then is a rare event,
Joining, in the candle-glow,
Two men a while ago so young
But now with temples turning gray. . . .
To find that half our friends are dead
Shocks us, burns our hearts with grief.
Little we guessed it would be twenty years
Before I could visit you again.
When I went away, you were still unmarried;
But now these boys and girls in a row
Are very kind to their father's old friend.
They ask me where I have been, on my journey;
And after we have talked a little,
They bring and show me wines and dishes,
Spring chives cut in the night-rain
And brown rice cooked especially.
My host proclaims a festival,
Urges me to drink ten cups.
But what ten cups could make me as drunk
As I always am with your love in my heart?
Tomorrow the mountains will separate us;
And after tomorrow—who can say!

H. L. Mencken

By H. L. MENCKEN

ASK a professional critic to write about himself and you simply ask him to do what he does every day in the practice of his art and mystery. There is, indeed, no criticism that is not a confidence, and there is no confidence that is not self-revelation. When I denounce a book with mocking and contumely, and fall upon the poor author in the brutal, Asiatic manner of a drunken longshoreman, a Ku Kluxer, or a midshipman at Annapolis, I am only saying, in the trade cant, that the fellow disgusts me—that his ideas and his manners are somehow obnoxious to me, as those of a Methodist, a golf-player, or a clog-dancer are obnoxious to me—in brief, that I hold myself to be a great deal better than he is, and am eager to say so. And when, on the other hand, I praise a book in high, astounding terms, and speak of the author as if his life and sufferings were of capital importance to the world, then I am merely saying that I detect something in him, of prejudice, tradition, habit of mind, that is much like something within myself, and that my own life and sufferings are of the utmost importance to me.

That is all there ever is in criticism, once it gets beyond cataloguing. No matter how artfully the critic may try to be impersonal and scientific he is bound to give himself away. In fact, his very effort to be impersonal and scientific is a form of giving himself away, as the writings of my eminent colleague, Prof. Dr. Erskine, well demonstrate. I have never had the honor of being presented to Erskine, but I know quite as well as his grandmother that he is essentially a shy man—that the winds of doctrine alarm him and he has no stomach for rough adventure. Hence his plea for decorum and tradition, i. e., for what has passed the stage of experiment and danger, i. e., for safe harbors and refuges. He can no more get himself out of his criticism than he can get himself out of his skin. Nor can, at the other pole, the critical Bolsheviki of Greenbaum Village—all of them as foreign and as loathsome to Erskine, I daresay, as so many Nietzsches or Beethovens. When these bright young men print profound aesthetic treatises upon the art of Fatty Arbuckle, Gertrude Stein, and the "Parisian Widows" burlesque troupe, they say, of course, nothing that is pertinent to aesthetics, but they do say something extremely amusing about their own tastes, and hence about themselves. More, they say something even more amusing about the seminaries where they were bred to the humanities.

With criticism thus so transparent, so unescapably revelatory, I often marvel that the gentlemen who concern themselves with my own books, often very indignantly, do not penetrate more competently to my essence. Even for a critic I am excessively garrulous and confidential; nevertheless, it is rare for me to encounter a criticism that hits me where I live and have my being. A great deal of ink is wasted trying to discover and denounce my motive in being a critic at all. I am, by one theory, a German spy told off to flay, terrorize, and stampede the Anglo-Saxon. By another I am a secret radical, while professing to admire Coolidge, Judge Gary, and Genghis Khan. By a third, I am a fanatical American chauvinist, bent upon defaming and ruining the motherland. All these notions are nonsense; only the first has even the slightest plausibility. The plain truth is—and how could it be plainer?—that I practice criticism for precisely the same reason that every other critic practices it: because I am a vain fellow, and have a great many ideas on all sorts of subjects, and like to put them into words and harass the human race with them. If I could confine this flow of ideas to one subject I'd be a professor and get some respect. If I could reduce it, say, to one idea a year, I'd be a novelist, a dramatist, or a newspaper editorial writer. But being unable to staunch the flux, and having, as I say, a vast and exigent vanity, I am a critic of books, and through books of Homo sapiens, and through Homo sapiens of God.

So much for the motive. What, now, of the substance? What is the fundamental faith beneath all the spurting and coruscating of ideas that I have just mentioned? What do I primarily and immovably believe in, as a Puritan believes in hell? I believe in liberty. And when I say liberty, I mean the thing in its widest imaginable sense—liberty up to the extreme limits of the feasible and tolerable. I am against forbidding anybody to do anything, or say anything, or think anything so long as it is at all possible to imagine a habitable world in which he would be free to do, say, and think it. The burden of proof, as I see it, is always upon the policeman, which is to say, upon the lawmaker, the theologian, the right-thinker. He must prove his case doubly, triply, quadruply, and then he must start all over and prove it again. The eye through which I view him is watery and jaundiced. I do not pretend to be "just" to him—any more than a Christian pretends to be just to the devil. He is the enemy of everything I admire and respect in this world—of everything that makes it various and amusing and charming. He impedes every honest search for the truth. He stands against every sort of good-will and common decency. His ideal is that of an animal trainer, an archbishop, a major general in the army. I am against him until the last galoot's ashore.

This simple and childlike faith in the freedom and dignity of man—here, perhaps, stated with undue rhetoric—should be obvious, I should think, to every critic above the mental backwardness of a Federal judge. Nevertheless, very few of them, anatomizing my books, have ever showed any sign of detecting it. But all the same even the dullest of them has, in his fashion, sensed it; it colors unconsciously all the diatribes about myself that I have ever read. It is responsible for the fact that in England and Germany (and, to the extent that I have ever been heard of at all, in France and Italy) I am regarded as a highly typical American—in truth, as almost the archetype of the American. And it is responsible equally for the fact that here at home I am often denounced as the worst American unhung. The paradox is only apparent. The explanation of it lies in this: that to most Europeans the United States is still regarded naively as the land of liberty par excellence, whereas to most Americans the thing itself has long ceased to have any significance, and to large numbers of them, indeed, it has of late taken on an extreme obnoxiousness. I know of no civilized country, indeed, in which liberty is less esteemed than it is in the United States today; certainly there is none in which more persistent efforts are made to limit it and put it down. I am thus, to Americans, a bad American, but to Europeans, still unaware of the practical effects of the Wilson idealism and the Roosevelt saloon-bouncer ethic, I seem to be an eloquent spokesman of the true American tradition. It is a joke, but the joke is not on me.

Liberty, of course, is not for slaves: I do not advocate inflicting it on men against their conscience. On the contrary, I am strongly in favor of letting them crawl and grovel all they please—before the Supreme Court of the United States, Gompers, J. P. Morgan, Henry Cabot Lodge, the Anti-Saloon League, or whatever other fraud or combination of frauds they choose to venerate. I am thus unable to make the grade as a Liberal, for Liberalism always involves freeing human beings against their will—often, indeed, to their obvious damage, as in the cases of the majority of Negroes and women. But all human beings are not congenital slaves, even in America. Here and there one finds a man or a woman with a great natural passion for liberty—and a hard job getting it. It is, to me at least, a vast pleasure to go to the rescue of such a victim of the herd, to give him some aid and comfort in his struggle against the forces that seek to regiment and throttle him. It is a double pleasure to succor him when the sort of liberty he strives for is apparently unintelligible and valueless—for example, liberty to address conventions of the I.W.W., to read the books of such bad authors as D. H. Lawrence and Petronius Arbiter, to work twelve hours a day, to rush the can, to carry red flags in parades, to patronize osteopaths and Christian Science healers, to belong to the best clubs. Such nonsensical varieties of liberty are especially sweet to me. I have wrecked my health and dissipated a fortune defending them—never, so far as I know, successfully. Why, then, go on? Ask yourself why a grasshopper goes on jumping.

But what has liberty to do with the art of literary criticism, my principal business in this vale? Nothing—or everything. It seems to me that it is perfectly possible to write profound and valuable literary criticism without entering upon the question of freedom at all, either directly or indirectly. Aesthetic judgments may be isolated from all other kinds of judgments, and yet remain interesting and important. But this isolation must be performed by other hands: to me it is as sheer a psychological impossibility as believing that God condemned forty-two little children to death for poking fun at Elisha's bald head. When I encounter a new idea, whether aesthetic, political, theological, or epistemological, I ask myself, instantly and automatically, what would happen to its proponent if he should state its exact antithesis. If nothing would happen to him, then I am willing and eager to listen to him. But if he would lose anything valuable by a volte face—if stating his idea is profitable to him, if the act secures his roof, butters his parsnips, gets him a tip—then I hear him with one ear only. He is not a free man. Ergo, he is not a man. For liberty, when one ascends to the levels where ideas swish by and men pursue Truth to grab her by the tail, is the first thing and the last thing. So long as it prevails the show is thrilling and stupendous; the moment it fails the show is a dull and dirty farce.

Mr. Mencken's article is the third in The Nation's *series of articles on critics by themselves. The first was by Heywood Broun in the Fall Book Number; the second by Ludwig Lewisohn in the issue of November 21. Carl Van Doren, John Macy, and E. W. Howe are preparing articles for this series. # Arabia Deserta

By MARK VAN DOREN

AN American edition of "Arabia Deserta"[*] would be the event of any year, as it is certainly of this. Until now Mr. Doughty's masterpiece has been either unobtainable in the original English edition of 1888 or too expensive in the facsimile of 1920. The new reprint, introduced by Colonel Lawrence, perhaps the only living man worthy of the privilege, brings one of the great travel books of all time within the reach—unfortunately it cannot be said the easy reach—of such readers as care a great deal for Arabia and in addition care everything for poetry.

For the book, besides being the most informing work on Northwestern Arabia in existence, is by any definition a stupendous poem. It is a triumph of human language, more remarkable even, in spite of the fact that it takes the form of prose, than Mr. Doughty's six-volume epic of "The Dawn in Britain." It relates the wanderings of its author in 1876-1878 over the triangle roughly marked by the three cities of Medym Salih, Boreyda, and Jidda, where "I wandered on, through that vast mountainous labyrinthine solitude of rainless valleys," or "rode with a friendly sheykh of the district Beduins, to live with them awhile in the high desert. I might thus, I hoped, visit the next Arabian uplands and view those vast waterless marches of the nomad Arabs; tent-dwellers, inhabiting, from the beginning, as it were beyond the World." And it employs a style which Mr. Doughty, "a disciple of the divine Muse of Spenser and Venerable Chaucer," deliberately invented for our difficulty, lest we think Arabia a land lightly to be entered upon.

"The book is not milk for babes: it might be likened to a mirror, wherein is set forth faithfully some parcel of the soil of Arabia smelling of sámn and camels. And such, I trust, for the persons, that if the words (written all-day from their mouths) were rehearsed to them in Arabic, there might every one, whose life is remembered therein, hear, as it were, his proper voice; and many a rude bystander, smiting his thigh, should bear witness and cry 'Ay Wellah, the sooth indeed!'" The punctuation, the diction, the syntax, and the mind behind them conspire as we read to remove us thousands of miles and—literally—thousands of years from our accustomed selves. The other classics of Arabian travel, Burckhardt, Palgrave, Burton, Lady Anne Blunt, speak to us in rapid, modern, expository or narrative prose; and they are excellent. But after we have labored over the crowded and endless pages of Doughty these others seem the thinnest journalism. We turn back to the first sentence of "Arabia Deserta" and realize in a flash the secret of this heavy, slow music, this writing wherein each sentence has gone through the torture of a separate birth: "A new voice hailed me of an old friend when, first returned from the Peninsula, I paced again in that long street of Damascus which is called Straight; and suddenly taking me wondering by the hand 'Tell me (said he), since thou art here again in the peace and assurance of Ullah, and whilst we walk, as in the former years, toward the new blossoming orchards, full of the sweet spring as the garden of God, what moved thee, or how couldst thou take such journeys into the fanatic Arabia?'"

[*] Travels in Arabia Deserta. By Charles M. Doughty. With a New Preface by the Author, an Introduction by T. E. Lawrence, and all original Maps, Plans, and Cuts. Boni and Liveright. 2 vols. $17.50.

The only effect which Mr. Doughty wanted to produce was the effect of completeness, and he has produced it. He did not know, or he disdained, the tricks of the ordinary travelogue—the panorama suddenly unveiled, the act of violence let loose with a complacent flourish upon the unsuspecting reader. There are no devices of arrangement, there are no sacrifices to picturesqueness. The result is picturesqueness on the grandest conceivable scale. We see everything, or rather we experience everything. A glimpse of a mountain or a village is caught for a moment—then that small part is swallowed up in the whole, as it would be for a traveler on the ground who was hungry and weary and in pain. More is always pressing from the sides; there is no rest. Had we been there, as sometimes we think we have, our memories now would be of this same blended sort. The caravan in which the author proceeded from Damascus to Medym Salih would present itself as now it does—an unending train of dusty camels, trudging every day toward Mecca and never quite arriving. We could as little pretend that we had dominated the scene as Doughty pretends, in the case of a certain stretch of volcanic desert, that he even existed before it. "We look out from every height, upon the Harra, over an iron desolation; what uncouth blackness and lifeless cumber of volcanic matter!—an hard-set face of nature without a smile for ever, a wilderness of burning and rusty horror of unformed matter. . . . There is a startled conscience within a man of his mesquin being, and profane, in presence of the divine stature of the elemental world!—this lion-like sleep of cosmogonic forces, in which is swallowed up the gnat of the soul within him—that short motion and parasitical usurpation which is the weak accident of life in matter."

The peculiar quality of richness which Mr. Doughty has achieved derives chiefly of course from the richness within himself; but he is not without an excellent technique for expressing it. He knows how to jumble poetic details with prosaic; he is not afraid to seem to be burying his best material. There is always a thick rain of facts, and toward the end of a long paragraph he does not mind pelting you with particulars in no order whatsoever. A single paragraph, like a single moment or hour of desert experience, is seldom a unit. Thus we get something vastly better than a series of essays or a series of views; the pages, like the realities, are interwoven. There is much wretchedness and no romance. There are patience and endurance, and there is an incessant coming and going of more or less hostile men; but there is no heroism. "Arabia Deserta" is never an adventure story. A sick mare, a camel, a dog is likely to take as much of the author's attention as a sherîf who wants to arrest him, a woman who wants to marry him, or a Nabatean inscription which as a scholar he must stop and copy. Animals indeed are faultlessly observed, and often they are described with a pen that Homer would not have been ashamed to hold. "They milk first for the mare and then (often in the same vessel) for the nomad household. She stands straining upon her tether, looking toward the pleasant sound of milking: the bowl frothing from the udder is carried to her in the herdsman's hand and she sups through her teeth the sweet warm milk, at a long draught."

"The more you learn of Arabia the more you find in 'Arabia Deserta,'" says Colonel Lawrence, who knows the Peninsula both as an archaeologist and as a soldier. Most readers will never go to Arabia, but the more they read "Arabia Deserta" the more they will find in it. It is an unquestionable classic in that, the most important, sense. To quote Colonel Lawrence again, it "has no date and can never grow old."

Novel or Pamphlet?

Don Juan. By Ludwig Lewisohn. Boni and Liveright. $2.

MR. LEWISOHN in a recent article in The Nation has declared himself a pamphleteer, and further remarked that there is no reason why pamphleteering should not be as well done as any other division of the literary art. A pamphleteer he is, one of the best among our moderns, and never more effectively so than in "Don Juan."

Those who wish to quarrel with "Don Juan" as a pamphlet advocating more liberality in divorce will have plenty of argument on their hands. It is true that Mr. Lewisohn has hand-picked his case. He has chosen for a hero a man so sensitively organized that the love of a loving wife, who cannot or will not understand him, is an oppression which makes all activity unendurable. He has chosen a hero with moral fiber so sensitive that sex satisfaction without love is impossible and its denial dulls his whole being. He has given him a wife whose love is indestructible by argument or circumstance, who is, in short, possessive to a degree that is almost pathological, and he has made him find and fall in love with a young girl exactly to his taste whom he cannot make his lover in fact without irreparable damage to moral standards which he accepts. His wife will not divorce him—that is the crux of the story. In the situation which Mr. Lewisohn provides, a man's life must be ruined, a young girl's first love wasted, in order that a wife may hold a husband who cannot be happy or even normal with her, or make her happy, unless it is happiness to have one's will.

Clearly this is a special case. Most men under such circumstances, and with the moral fineness of this Don Juan, would sublimate their passion, as the psychologists say: if they could not run away with their loved one they would find some modus vivendi, some outlet for energy within the bonds of matrimony. They would not find personal happiness, and to that they would have no prescriptive right—but they would not, like Lucien of this story, be smashed. And few wives of Elise's caliber would be so hopelessly wrong in their legal rightness as she, so entirely instinctive. Possessiveness would often give way to anger or at least pride. Mr. Lewisohn has imagined a situation in which the husband is absolutely right in wishing to be divorced, provided one grants that it is right for him to follow the only course in which he can be human, happy, and useful to himself or anyone. He has contrived a situation in which the wife has every legal right to hold him, since he has not committed adultery, not been cruel in the legal sense, not deserted her. With the intellectual's fondness for clarity and logic, whether in settling the war or in the muddle of domestic life, he draws up a formula, shows that it would save his character from misery, and then scorns the world for not adopting it forthwith. Mr. Lewisohn has proved his case for Lucien and Elise, but I can imagine a judge, wise in the experience of the divorce courts and the grosser souls that flock there, who might wag his head over a solution of the most urgent of modern problems which is studied from exceptional people in exceptional circumstances.

As an argument "Don Juan" does not impress me; but as a pleading before the bar of a stupidly conventional world it moves me deeply. Mr. Lewisohn has not proved that anyone should have a divorce when he wishes it, and presumably he never intended to, but it is impossible to read his story without a stir of indignation. It impels to one of two positions. Either marriage is a sacrament not to be broken, in which case the suffering of the mismated individual must be regarded as acquiring merit for his soul, or marriage is not a sacrament, in which case it is absurd that mental anguish, stunted development, and sexual repression should not be weighed as causes for breaking it, along with the so-called statutory offenses. We have radically altered the methods and causes by which and for which two people are brought together in matrimony—even the least thoughtful know that. Now we must reconsider the causes and the methods for which and by which they may be separated. As a plea for this "Don Juan" is a brilliant success.

Excellently written, poignantly argued, dramatically conceived, this book, however, must be praised as a pamphlet, not as a novel. For a novel of equivalent excellence must have personalities as human as they can be made, and Lucien, Elise, Helga the loved one, Grace, with whom Lucien solaces himself, are scarcely real. Each embodies a logical point in Mr. Lewisohn's argument. If they had been more human their "cases" would have been muddled, been full of cross-currents as in life; the emphasis must have fallen not upon the point to be proved but upon the personal fortunes of the protagonists. "It is the remediable moral suffering in the world that crowds my vision —the remediable moral suffering, remediable by a little hard thinking, a little tolerance, a little more goodness, a little less righteousness. If I write a criticism it is to further that supreme end; if I write a novel it is to further the same end." Thus, Mr. Lewisohn, in the self-portrait to which I have already referred. And that is just what he has done in "Don Juan"—written, according to my way of thinking, a rather unreal novel, a brilliant piece of special pleading, an admirable pamphlet likely to produce results. ## The Chaplet of Prometheus

Fantastica: being The Smile of the Sphinx and Other Tales of Imagination. By Robert Nichols. With a foreword by John Masefield. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

ROBERT NICHOLS is a poet turned philosopher. At a time when it is considered the business of a poet to sit in his cage and sing sweetly, this meddling with large human problems will be held against him; and therefore he ought to be heard in his own defense. He is not in the least ashamed; indeed, he calls upon his fellow-poets to follow his example. "In the name of St. Francis, of Blake, of Shelley, cease you poets from lounging beside the hedgerows! Leave your somewhat fuddled loves and your fretful disillusions. . . . Give your thoughts more the quality of an act." For him this preoccupation with Truth is no apostasy to Beauty. The poets are the true "determinators of value," and a poet's truth may be quite as significant as a scientist's, and as powerful in guiding the destinies of mankind. So he explains himself in an earnest and interesting, if confused, preface.

This manifesto, for it is no less, may perhaps be taken, in conjunction with a few other contemporary instances of a similar sort, as a symptom of a change of mood among the younger poets, a wish to make of the poetic faculty not a mere refuge from the evils of life, but an instrument for dealing with life—a sword or a plowshare, instead of a pipe of dreams. And if the instrument is, as in this instance it would seem to be, insufficiently tempered or sharpened, it may still be recognized as of the same metaphysical steel that Blake and Shelley used in the planting of beautiful and the killing of ugly ideals of life.

In becoming a philosopher, then, Mr. Nichols has not at all ceased to be a poet; and it is in a poet's prose, and with a poet's mythopoeic gift, that he has expressed, in this book of stories, his thoughts and feelings about life. They are, these stories, fairy-tales in form; some of them not unfamiliar, but reshaped freely for his own purposes. As to what these purposes are, the preface-manifesto leaves us in no doubt. One might not always guess it from the stories themselves, but they are deliberately concerned with serious matters—with the most serious matter of all, what we want life to be like.

Where there are such brave intentions, one hesitates to pronounce judgment on the results; and yet, where the aim is so high, failure itself is honorable. An Icarus may all too likely find his wings melted by the white-hot splendor he has dared to approach so closely. Mr. Nichols might easily have avoided any such uncomfortable questioning of his success if, with his talents, he had dared less. It is to his credit that he has taken as his scope not merely "the illusions of troubled senses," but has ranged back through history and myth and forward into a speculative future—even though, as it appears, sometimes unfortunately upon sociological wings of wax.

But though not failure but low aim is crime in morals, in art on the contrary the final test is success. And Mr. Nichols, by his own preliminary declarations of intention, has made it practically impossible for us to grant him success. If Robin Hood begins by saying, "I will split yon willow-wand with my arrow," we cannot thereupon applaud him for hitting a bird on the branch above.

It was doubtless a mistake on Mr. Nichols's part to have thus called his shots. For art is after all not marksmanship. The thing one hits by accident may be well worth hitting. It is one of the curious qualities of a work of art that, if it is self-complete, it bears a variety of relations to the outside world of life, and hence a variety of possible "meanings," some of which are unsuspected and unintended by the artist. For the author to state his own interpretation of a tale is to do himself an injustice. "In this story I seek to bring to light the very justification, as I see it, of life itself: no humble ambition." It would certainly have been more discreet to leave the reader to find what meaning he might in the pleasant little fairy-tale so boldly vouched for, The Smile of the Sphinx, inasmuch as it could scarcely come up to such brave specifications even if it were better than it is.

Concerning Sir Perseus and the Fair Andromeda the author makes less rash claims, and one may easily find it to be not only an amusing variation upon an old legend but, with its very pagan rescued lady and its very Christian and medieval rescuing hero, an interesting study in the contrasting temperaments of two historical periods. But even here one is likely to find the author's prefatory guidance disturbing. "Once again the Will-to-enjoy-action is pointed at as Andromeda parades her Aristotelian dance." One claims leave, as a free citizen of the republic of letters, to see a point or fail to see it, without being jogged by an earnest auctorial elbow!

These are pleasant tales, particularly the latter, which justifies itself on those grounds of mere entertainment which the author is too hastily inclined to disparage. But the final tale, Golgotha & Co., must be taken seriously or not at all. It is a story of the Second Coming; this fable, as the author remarks, has been treated before—"but a fable is what one makes of it." And he makes a good deal of it by involving it in a large Wellsian-Chestertonian satire on modern industrialism and mob-psychology. The tale is indeed chiefly interesting as showing in grotesque enlargement some of the weaknesses of our civilization; but in these matters the central drama tends to get lost, and to emerge, when it finally does, in a state of vast confusion. The author's philosophic and poetic excitements over his theme have made him too forgetful of the requirements of story-telling.

Mr. Nichols does not fail to explain this story in his preface, and again there is a discrepancy between his magnificent intentions and his actual story. He intended to show that the doctrine of might must be overthrown, and that it is the poets who shall save the world. But in setting forth these intentions he says some interesting things about himself: "I am forever with Faust the Experimentalist and Prometheus the Creator. Indeed, as a young artist, I couldn't be anything else. . . . In an age dominated by disbelief and detachment I rejoice that I can believe and I endeavor not to be detached—not detached even so far as to separate my life and my art. When I take up the pen I take it as one who would serve life." In fact—and this is the conclusion to which one is likely to come as one turns again and again from these stories to this preface, and lingers there fascinated by the ingenuous egotism and adventurous youthfulness with which it is suffused—Mr. Nichols is more interesting than his philosophic fairy-tales.

Accordingly one formulates one's impressions of his qualities —not all of them good ones, but always with some grace to save them—only to find that he has anticipated the reader in this matter also, taken the words out of his mouth, and said of himself the worst and best that can fairly be said:

"How serious I have been! How much in earnest I am—sitting up to all hours of the night after a hard day's work in an uncomfortable climate in a far-off land—ignorant, unbalanced, presumptuous, determined, trying to be calm, carried away by passion, grinding at books distasteful to an artist, lacking in humor or pleasantness, conceited—justified only by only one thing, by the memory of the Forward Area of Ypres. Absurdly in earnest, maybe!—seeing how inept the championship, how small can be the results. I should not be doing this. It is not my job. But those who should be doing it lie dead; the skies lower; lightning flickers up the heavens like the silent brandishing of swords, and as yet not even the Legions of Love, the Samurai of the Ideal, are formed, still less has the youth, bearing about his brows the fiery chaplet of Prometheus, appeared."

No, Mr. Nichols has not quite stolen fire from heaven for us; but he has tried—and failed, if one must use that word, nobly enough.

The Prince of Scholars

Erasmus: A Study of His Life, Ideals and Place in History. By Preserved Smith. Harper and Brothers. $4.

IF Erasmus is here more fortunate than he has yet been in the hands of a biographer, he owes his good fortune, in part, to a whole corps of recent editors and specialists, but in part, also, to the fact that Preserved Smith belongs with the few human beings who at once appreciate Erasmus and understand Luther. The book is therefore noticeably free from partisan enthusiasms. In temper Mr. Smith is closer to Erasmus, a reasonable man who loved learning; by long association in his researches Mr. Smith has been brought very close to Luther, a less reasonable man, who for the sake of a particular cause was willing to endure the horrid din and danger of theological politics. Though it is true that the later chapters of this study go now and then into what may seem excessive detail with regard to the conflict between the scholar and the reformer, this may possibly be justified on the ground that so were the later years of Erasmus confused, if not bedraggled, by the oppressive details of the controversy into which he was drawn. The total effect is unquestionably dramatic, like an ancient tragedy: a man who had put the arrows of reason into many hands saw various of his followers go to war and was himself wounded in his old age.

However tragic in certain of its aspects, the career of Erasmus must seem, to the scholar, almost Utopian. He was never seriously handicapped by poverty; he had all Europe for his scene of action, with princes and cities contending for the honor of entertaining him; he lived in an age when the rewards of learning were immense. To dig even a little beneath the surface in those days was to find a whole world of knowledge and beauty in the manuscripts, long neglected, of Greek and Latin authors who "after a thousand years of Gothic darkness" seemed like gold and myrrh and wine and fresh water and flaming sunlight. Erasmus and his contemporaries might concern themselves primarily with textual criticism, but it was no mere tedious editing for the rheumy eyes of a few fellow-experts. Every new manuscript was a genuine discovery, and each new author published measurably enlarged the universe. The more exact the text and commentary which a scholar produced, the more significant his influence at large. Nothing that Erasmus did, it may be guessed, did more to promote his humane and rational spirit than his Greek version of the New Testament. His "Adages" was after all a volume of familiar quotations, intended for the use to which such compilations are always put. His "Colloquies" was a textbook of Latin style. Even in his less technical works, like the "Enchiridion of the Christian Knight," the "Institution of a Christian Prince," or the famous "Praise of Folly," he was essentially the scholar relaxed, applying to the general life of mankind the strict yet liberal conclusions at which he had arrived in his studies. His eminence, of course, depends upon the presence in him of both erudition and imagination. Without imagination he would never have been a great textual critic. Without erudition he would never have given the edge and substance which he gave to his popular writings. The addition to these qualities of wit and comic force made him irresistible. Thus all the aptitudes of Erasmus conspired with the propitiousness of his time to make his career superb.

Sympathetically as Mr. Smith has followed that career, he does not suppress the inevitable question whether Erasmus might not have taken a more emphatic stand in the controversies which he helped to rouse. Doubtless he might have done so, but he would have had to be a different Erasmus. On this point there can hardly be an absolute conclusion. History, for all its abundance, does not show a single hero able in his own person to tear down as much as Erasmus and build up as much as Luther. While the race is waiting for some such paragon, it may well be lenient in demanding that this or that actual protagonist accomplish all that may some day be expected. Meantime there comes up the other question whether the cause of reason is not best served by those reasonable men who, like Erasmus, persist in acting, against no matter how many evidences, as though the majority of men were reasonable too. If Luther loved mankind too well not to feel under obligation to reform it, Erasmus paid it the enormous compliment of feeling no obligation to condescend to the reformer's arts.

CARL VAN DOREN

The Rootabaga Country

Rootabaga Pigeons. By Carl Sandburg. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

CRITICS of children's books are notoriously skeptical or gullible concerning second volumes of popular story books. More often than not—without apparent reading of the book—they are able to say of it either that it is distinctly inferior to the author's first book or that he has "done it again," and nothing comparable has appeared since "Alice in Wonderland" or Hans Andersen's Fairy Tales. To one or both of these great classics it is the common habit of American reviewers to contrast all new children's books without regard to content, form, or atmosphere. One critic feels that "Rootabaga Pigeons" bears to "Rootabaga Stories" a relation similar to that borne by Lewis Carroll's second volume of "Sylvie and Bruno" to the first.

No such parallel exists in the case of Sandburg. The stories in "Rootabaga Pigeons" were, with one or two exceptions, written long before "Rootabaga Stories" was published. Carl Sandburg had been writing these stories for years just as they came into his mind. He had written enough of them to make two books. Whether two books or one should have been made of the stories is an open question. The situation is that we have two books of his stories—one published last year, one this year —which are equally entitled to fresh, full, and fair consideration for all the nonsense, the folk stuff, the poetry, the beauty, and the genuine child psychology they hold.

Carl Sandburg alone could tell us which of the stories was written first. Does it matter? Are we not more deeply concerned with the nature and quality of his performance in both books?

It is true that the lightning of discovery rarely strikes a reader twice in the same place and those who were fortunate enough to read and like How They Broke Away to Go to the Rootabaga Country first will doubtless look in vain for any story in "Rootabaga Pigeons" to give them quite the same delicious sensation.

That story was wisely placed first in the first book. It either transports you straight into the Rootabaga Country or it leaves you high and dry where "everything is the same as it always was." There's no half-way station to Rootabaga. You go all the way or you don't go at all. If you go, you are delighted to meet bushel baskets going and coming, saying under their breath: "Bushels, bushels, bushels." It's just what one would expect a bushel basket to be saying, only in this day of records no one has ever recorded it before.

Sandburg's nonsense is fresh nonsense. If pressed for a comparison I would say that he has more in common with Edward Lear than with any other writer for children, but he is not an imitator of anybody and I think it would be impossible to imitate him successfully, for there's an essential truth to the life he knows behind all his stories. Many of them have the quality and charm of an artist's first sketch. Some of them were manifestly not written for children. When Carl Sandburg makes the selection from the two books for a definitive volume of American folk and nonsense stories for children he will have the unusual advantage of knowing which of his stories appeal to children.

Do children really like the stories? Some children do, other children do not. Children have as varied tastes in reading as we do. The children on whom they have been "tried out" by parents or teachers who actively dislike the stories are seldom attracted to them, and no wonder.

"Are you reading out of that book?" I asked a little girl of half-past four. She was looking at the picture of the Potato Face Blind Man playing his accordion in front of the post office.

"Yes, I read about the Potato Face Blind Man. He's playing to the flummywisters yodeling their yisters in the elm trees. They do that out in my yard. I love that Potato Face Blind Man. I read about the Zizzies too. They're so funny. The Zizzies make me laugh." And this little New England nonsense lover, who was born "funny inside," laughed as only a child can laugh who is not yet able to read in the accepted sense. Then she said, as she put the book into my hands, "You read it to me."

"I've never read a book anything like it before," said a twelve-year-old New York boy. "I tried to read the Wedding Procession of the Rag Doll and the Broom Handle aloud and I had to stop I laughed so. There's a whole lot of things I never knew about the West in those stories."

There's still more about the West in "Rootabaga Pigeons"—a little too much perhaps in the keenly satirical story of the Sooners and the Boomers. There are paragraphs in that story which might well be eliminated from a children's book.

But I do not propose to offer any idle, captious criticism of a book which contains, as I believe, so much genuine creative art as is to be found in "Rootabaga Pigeons." I may not like it better than the first book; certainly I found no more beautiful story than the White Horse Girl and the Blue Wind Boy, and I find "Rootabaga Pigeons" containing stories of more universal appeal, mellower, closer to children, happier in title, and positively charged with the best kind of child psychology.

The story of the Christmas twins born out in a tar-paper shack in a cinder yard holds for me something of that same deep experience of American life, its romance, its humor, its tenderness, its pathos, its playing the game, that Mark Twain began to draw upon when he wrote "Tom Sawyer" and "Huckleberry Finn."

I'm not comparing Sandburg with Mark Twain. I'm only saying he's writing fresh and very beautiful stories of American life for a new generation of Americans—stories which are bound to influence other writers for children because they stir and challenge the creative faculties of their readers.

The Demon of Unemployment

The Third Winter of Unemployment. The Report of an Enquiry undertaken in the Autumn of 1922. By J. J. Astor, A. L. Bowley, and others. London: P. S. King & Son, Ltd. 6s.

The Economics of Unemployment. By J. A. Hobson. London: George Allen & Unwin, Ltd. 4/6.

The Burden of Unemployment. By Philip Klein. Russell Sage Foundation. $2.

"THE years 1921 and 1922 are the worst in the records of unemployment in this country [Great Britain]. In only one month in the present century before 1921 did the percentage of unemployed trade-union members exceed ten; in no month since March, 1921, has it fallen below fourteen." If short time be added to unemployment, "a fifth or more of the industrial power of the country is running to waste." In this striking form does the first book under review summarize the British situation. After two full years of unexampled depression, the autumn of 1922 still found one out of every eleven of the makers of textiles, clothing, and food, wholly unemployed, an eighth of the workers in miscellaneous industries, a sixth of the miners, building operatives, and transport workers, a fourth of the engineers and metal workers, and two-fifths of the shipbuilders. During the fiscal year ending March 31, 1922, the government dispensed more than £80,000,000 in relief to 1,850,000 unemployed workers; and at the end of August the number on the insurance books vainly seeking work still came to 1,427,311.

Small wonder, then, facing a third winter of unemployment with few signs of improvement, that a group of students and public men thought it desirable to make a study "of the extent and the effects of the present depression, of the means that have been adopted to relieve it, and the effects of these measures." Names like A. L. Bowley, Henry Clay, and Seebohm Rowntree guarantee the scientific character of the work, and the signature of Major the Hon. J. J. Astor testifies that this is not a "red" document. It is in fact a sober, objective, unemotional report showing once more that Englishmen know how to meet an impossible situation without panic and without passion. In addition to a careful study of official returns, the committee made nine illuminating local studies, whose leading results are here published, along with a ninety-page summary and interpretation for the United Kingdom as a whole. Call the roll of great British industries, mining, steel-making, and engineering, shipbuilding, shipping, and textiles, and Cardiff, Middlesbrough, Birmingham, Sheffield, Woolwich, Glasgow, Manchester, Burnley, and Stoke-on-Trent respond in these pages.

To deal first with relief, a general, compulsory, contributory scheme of unemployment insurance had gone into effect just before the depression fell. To meet the crisis, the actuarial basis of the plan had to be abandoned at once. Current contributions of employers, employees, and the state to the fund were more than matched by state borrowings from past and future funds for the purpose, and thus £67,500,000 was disbursed in unemployment benefits during the year ending March 31, 1922. In addition, the unemployed received nearly £8,000,000 directly in poor relief (out of a total of poor-law rates more than four times as large), while the government spent on relief works not less than £6,000,000, and on miscellaneous relief, including increased school feeding, another £1,500,000, thus bringing the total above £80,000,000. Even so, the government furnished less than half the living of unemployed families; for their maintenance simply at Rowntree's poverty line would have cost about £200,000,000 for the year. Manifestly the unemployed were still drawing on savings, wearing out old clothes and equipment, making shift as best they could. In addition to direct relief, the government aided in the provision of work through grants to local authorities in aid of housing and other useful enterprises, and through the guaranty of credit to statutory authorities and private companies to facilitate export trade and domestic capital undertakings—the last named being a plan with highly interesting theoretical possibilities.

What have been the results of this extensive relief work? Let the report answer. "The first and most important feature of the depression is that the widespread physical distress, which was the normal accompaniment of unemployment in pre-war depressions, has been prevented . . . by insurance allowances, poor-law relief, and school feeding, at any rate in the classes that suffered first and most before the war. More than that, there is a great deal of evidence that health has been maintained unimpaired." The report says simply and honestly: "Health is better than in pre-war depressions, because the pre-war starvation is prevented." The mental strain, however, is intense and accelerating as months and years pass. Has income without work proved demoralizing? "Is there a growing inclination to depend on public relief, a growing reluctance to work? The evidence is rather to the contrary." Despite the disastrous effects of the loss of regular steady work, as regards the body of the workers "maintenance without work . . . is at any rate less demoralizing than unemployment without maintenance." "The great discovery that has been made is that a system of allowances by which the worst effects of distress are prevented does not necessarily involve widespread demoralization." An exception must be made regarding those unfortunate youths who spent in the army the years they should have spent learning a trade. "The fault is not theirs. . . . Their case . . . places a special responsibility on the society that let them come into their present condition."

The local reports indicate little political unrest, though the not illogical demand for full work or full maintenance was occasionally heard. Generally, however, the investigators found a "spirit of caution and acquiescence . . . a disposition to grin and bear it, and a distrust of panaceas from whatever quarter they are offered." "Other politicians besides the Communists have suffered deflation in the depression," remarks the report, dryly.

With characteristic British realism, the writers incidentally face the question whether the war has not readjusted industries and redistributed population so as to make recovery impossible for particular localities. Broadly speaking, their somewhat tentative conclusion is that a more or less catastrophic readjustment was inevitable, and that the only permanent remedy probably lies in a relocation of population (possibly with assisted migration) and its reabsorption into industries which must meet the ever-changing demands of world markets by a perpetual process of technical, commercial, and financial adjustment.

Into the bottom question of all the report does not enter. Is Great Britain as a whole overpopulated? In other words, is the continuing collapse of her market as an entirety to prove relatively permanent? For a stimulating if unorthodox answer we turn to John A. Hobson's "The Economics of Unemployment." The book is essentially a restatement and development of Mr. Hobson's well-known under-consumption or over-saving theory of crises. Put in a nutshell the theory is this. Under a fairly equal distribution the growing pressure of wants would keep a right balance between the immediate satisfaction of spending and the postponed satisfaction of saving. But as it is, the rich practically cannot spend their income (instance the 1 per cent of American income receivers who enjoy 14 per cent of the national income), and therefore they automatically "apply to the production of capital-goods a proportion of the aggregate productive power that exceeds the proportion needed, in accordance with existing arts of industry, to supply the consumptive goods which are purchased and consumed." Hence the ceaseless struggle for markets, the constant growth in the energy devoted to selling, as compared with making, goods, and, springing out of the belief in a limited market, the ca' canny policy of labor, the restrictive policy of the trust, and the national policies of protection and imperialism. And hence the overbuilding and consequent underemployment of plant (instance attested engineers' estimates of "excess capacity" in various American industries ranging mostly from 25 to 50 per cent), and the periodic piling up of unsalable goods, with the consequent crash of prices, shutting down of factories, unemployment, and all the well-known phenomena of the business crisis.

Mr. Hobson's remedy, in principle, is simple. "If the surplus income of the rich which produces this congestion and these stoppages were absorbed, either by the increasing share of the workers, or by the needs and uses of an enlightened state, or by both, this economic disease would be remedied." In slightly more detail, Mr. Hobson urges national ownership of prime monopolies, and control of profits, prices, and conditions of employment in competitive industries, "the whole of this linked up by a tax system whereby society secures for beneficial public services the idle elements of income which do not nourish or evoke productive effort."

Now it is no reply to Mr. Hobson to assert that by checking capital increase he would lessen, for example, the 3 to 4 per cent annual increase in the physical production of goods that has characterized the United States during the past half century. His point is that too large a proportion of income is saved, that the resulting capital-goods can function only feebly and intermittently, and that smaller proportionate saving with larger proportionate consumption and consequent steadier and more vigorous production would result not only in a larger and more regular flow of consumable commodities, but in an increase in the actual amount of saving, and a consequent greater absolute increase of capital-goods than now takes place. It is at this point, then, that his critics must join issue. Recent theorists have justly attacked him for giving us an industrial rather than a monetary theory of the crisis. Yet they have not succeeded in demolishing his basic contention that "bad" distribution inevitably upsets production—and it may be doubted whether they can do so.

Few close students of recent quantitative investigations into the distribution of income and savings in the United States, however, and into the relation between bank credit and the price level will probably be willing to accept Mr. Hobson's theory as a complete explanation of the business cycle. Yet our new knowledge of the large proportion of our saving that is "automatically" effected by corporations and wealthy individuals lends the more force to his contention and presents yet more sharply to disinterested thinking men the challenging question whether, in view of the facts of the cycle, the greater menace to prosperity is to be found in the activities of those who in good faith seek to maintain essentially unchanged our present distribution of income and our machinery of investment, or in the efforts of those who in equally good faith are seeking to forward those modifications which Mr. Hobson sums up as "the progressive movement in the life of the industrial nations." Certainly the latter group will nowhere find a more thoughtful and reasonable advocate of their proposals than Mr. Hobson.

Yet the reflective enthusiast, as he notes the present huge expenditures for armament and war, is likely to pause when he observes Mr. Hobson postulating "an enlightened state," and one that absorbs increasing income in "beneficial public services." Mr. Hobson would doubtless reply, in view of the causation of modern protectionism and imperialism, that his reforms would cut the tap-root of war, and again his critics would be hard put to it for a satisfactory retort.

From these two thought-provoking English books one turns with a measure of impatience to Philip Klein's "The Burden of Unemployment," a study of the half-baked, uncoordinated, largely unplanned relief measures undertaken in fifteen American cities during the winter of 1921-22. Here is no analysis or study of unemployment, no attempt at all to grapple with the real problem, but rather a handbook for charity workers and improvised mayor's committees, telling them largely what not to do when the disaster has come. For those who value that sort of thing the book will doubtless prove valuable. The rest of us can only continue in our wonderment that a great Foundation endowed with immense resources should forever go on choosing to be only a stretcher-bearer in the war on poverty. Fortunately, in the hunt for the unemployment dragon there are other organizations, even if less richly endowed ones, that have chosen to use the instruments of scientific research to help track the beast to his lair and there if possible to slay him—or at least to cut off the tip of his tail. And they are making progress, despite wars and self-seeking politicians and sentimentalists and automobiles and movies.

HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY

An Authentic Novel

J. Hardin & Son. By Brand Whitlock. D. Appleton and Company. $2.

IN the course of a lifetime of desultory reading I have grown, without conscious effort, into the habit of classifying novels as real and unreal. This is necessarily a rough method, and would probably be of slight value as a formula for the higher criticism; but it helps me. I make no pretense of being a higher critic.

The unreal novel has the same relation to literature that a vaudeville stunt has to the drama. It is something put together —more or less ingeniously—for the purpose of pleasing, or shocking, or thrilling. Such a novel is a corridor of emptiness in which one hears the echoes of other books and the footfalls of manufactured climaxes.

The real novel is set up around a core of truth and insight. Candor is more important than style; and penetration is more important than beauty. When you get through reading a real novel you may or may not agree with its author; and it is even possible that you may not like his book, but you will at least have the refreshing sense of having listened to somebody who has something to say.

"J. Hardin & Son" is a real book—genuine, vital, and sincere. It has depth; there is no flatness of the cinema about it. Depth of atmosphere and depth of character. When its people stand in the foreground their shadows stream away behind them. You feel that there is more to the story than you see in the cold type; that all these people have a past; that one must read between the lines. This sense of intimation is one of the great arts of literature.

The theme is ancient, but Mr. Whitlock gives it fresh color and substance. It is a story of the spiritual conflict between two generations, between the crystallized, austere, and stubborn will of a puritanical father and the expanding, flexible, artistic spirit of his son.

The scene is laid in a small Ohio town, and the story begins in the early eighties, when Paul Hardin is nine years of age. It comes to a close when he is forty-eight, and the sleepy little town has grown into a city fully equipped with railroad yards and beauty parlors. It is a record of a life which, in its early years, vibrated with feeling and temperament. In the course of time the joy of living slowly fades. The father passes away into a stern and rock-bound heaven, we suppose, but the son cannot escape his influence. There is a touch of Ibsen's "Ghosts" in this uncanny survival of a set of prejudices.

In the whole of his life the elder Hardin has never taken a drink, has never played poker, has never laid hands on a girl, has never enjoyed the vices in any form. Reading between the lines one can see that he has always wanted to do all these things. He makes a joy of renunciation, and his household is one of cheerful gloom. When Paul is about twenty he has a mild affair with a milkmaid on a farm. The news of this adventure reaches his father, who happens to be foreman of the grand jury then engaged in improving the morals of the county. He actually summons his own son before the jury for the purpose of holding him up publicly as an immoral object lesson.

This is not a burlesque. There are men entirely capable of doing that.

Paul is a born artist. What could a born artist do in Macochee except become the town drunkard or its richest man? Paul did not care much for liquor, so he turned his vivid imagination to business. His marriage was unhappy and loveless—through inexperience. But he does not escape love. Few people do. The town has a "pretty milliner." (What conventional devices Whitlock brings in!) Evelyn is her name, and Paul is genuinely and deeply in love with her. The thing becomes a public scandal, and his wife leaves him. She is as dissatisfied with him as he is with her, but she refuses to divorce him because that would not be proper. He and Evelyn are about to leave together when he is stricken by remorse, gives up his sweetheart, is elected president of a bank, and goes to the station to meet his wife, who has decided to come back to him. Poor little Evelyn is left standing on a country road, a pathetic figure against a gray sky. It is very annoying, and very much like life.

Remorse is the strangest of all sins. It is so useless. None of the great people of antiquity, except the Jews, knew anything of remorse. The old Jews cultivated it in a small and timid way, especially when their own rascality got them into trouble. The Puritans borrowed the idea from the Jews and improved it. Before they got through they had made it a really big thing. They left it, together with the Puritan conscience, as their legacy to the world, just as a churlish tenant, before giving up a house, sometimes throws a dead cat into the well.

"J. Hardin & Son" is a novel about the Puritan conscience and its attendant remorse. It is a novel of revolt. Although it is not a great book, it is a fine one. It falls short of greatness because —at least, so I think—Mr. Whitlock did not take enough pains in writing it. I suspect him of composing it on a typewriter. Over whole pages its sentences have a tendency to become flat and soggy. The book has beauty, but it has little or no charm. It is excellent in spite of its style.

It is an authentic novel, and is well worth reading.

W. E. WOODWARD

The Degradation of the Human Spirit

Christ or Mars? By Will Irwin. D. Appleton and Company. $1.50.

IN "Christ or Mars?" Mr. Irwin continues to garner the ripe fruit of his experiences as a reporter of the great war. His "The Next War" summed up massively the physical indictment of war—the obvious lessons to be learned from the first world war, to date unheeded, and the relentless logic of the preparedness doctrine, eventuating in the self-destruction of militarism. If many of the predictions made in this earlier volume may have seemed at the time excessive, the last two years have amply proved that Mr. Irwin understated rather than overstated the case against modern war and the imminence of another, possibly final, attack of this suicidal mania. The present volume is concerned with the spiritual balance sheet of war, and Mr. Irwin, like Sir Philip Gibbs—and one might add every enlightened observer at close range of the conduct of the recent war—presents the inescapable conclusion that modern warfare having discarded the last vestige of chivalry and restraint has become nothing less than mass murder and destruction, conducted for the first time with the resources and thoroughness of science. There is practically nothing to be said for this sort of war on the spiritual side, and the military apologists for war hardly need confutation. Spiritually, as physically and economically, war has become a dead loss to humanity.

Mr. Irwin's exceptional opportunities for the study of war as scientific slaughter and his temperate, unpartisan spirit, the spirit of a kindly, sympathetic citizen of the world with the beguiling American optimism of "It can be done!" make all that he says about its phenomena valuable testimony. Yet his conclusion—which is the special message of this book—deeply felt and often tenderly expressed as it is, that somehow humanity must get Christianity en masse, that the organized churches of the Christian faith must make the abolition of war their next great crusade, is not convincing on the evidence cited in the book itself of the inability of Christian principles, professed by the vast majority of the belligerents, even to humanize the last atrocious conflict. The fact would rather seem to have been proved incontrovertibly by the late war that modern peoples are not Christian either in spirit or in belief, and that for nearly two thousand years they have been paying a lip service to a faith that six days out of seven, if not on the seventh, their actions denied. The mournful spectacle of the priests of all Christian churches appealing simultaneously to a common God for victory over their enemies, and their death and destruction, would seem to have been sufficient to expose finally the pretense of the belief that our modern world is Christian in any sincere sense of the word. The fact that thousands of Christian ministers found no inconsistency in leading the hymn of hate, in urging their peoples into the bloody and unchristian arbitrament of arms, felt no sense of hypocrisy in standing before their congregations in the name of Christ and denouncing the Hun (or the Englishman as the case might be) would seem to the clear mind to prove conclusively that modern Christianity is not even remotely concerned with the teachings of Christ. The one sect that acted their Christianity was the Society of Friends and their very limited appeal to the peoples of today is but another proof of the absence of that Christian spirit in modern society which Mr. Irwin so confidently depends upon to work the mightiest miracle of all time.

No! It would seem wiser to accept the overwhelming proofs of the recent crisis that ours is not basically a Christian world, although it has been calling itself such, and seek boldly for those actual faiths according to which man lives today in Western Europe and North America—not merely professes on Sunday, but lives seven days in the week and for which he is willing to lay down, not only his life and those of his sons and brothers, but also his money. In that last word, not lightly dropped, would seem to lie a more promising path toward the abolition of war than the one optimistically advocated by Mr. Irwin. Mr. Irwin accepts as a matter of course the economic origin of all modern wars. Why not go the necessary further step and recognize that modern society because of this fact exists in a perpetual condition of endemic or incipient war? In order to eradicate the horrible manifestations of the disease at its explosive stage, it would seem necessary to check its operations in the incipient stages, that is in our times of so-called peace. Assuming, as Mr. Irwin assumes, and as every honest minded student of the case must assume, that wars are economic in origin, the cure must be made along economic lines, i.e., along lines of business—money. It is in man's lack of control of the economic garment of his life, his attitude toward property, that the root of his suicidal mania is to be found—and its cure.

Incidentally, Mr. Irwin himself recognizes that great moral reforms such as the abolition of slavery and prohibition have been ultimately brought about by a widespread realization of the economic waste in the customary practices. Why not therefore in war? The white races will give up the practice of war when the masses of their people recognize that war no longer pays. That is obvious to many already, but unfortunately it is not true as yet for the profiteer—and every modern business man is a potential profiteer—and the politician, for both see at least an immediate profit in the social disturbance attendant upon war. Until they can be convinced of the futility of war for them and their satellites, the military-minded, the popular journalist, and other social scavengers, war will continue to breed in times of peace. As always it is a race between man's intelligence, inhibited by old instincts and drugged by interested propaganda, and his parasites. Which will win the day nobody can predict, but from all signs it would seem that the race had got nearly to the last lap. ROBERT HERRICK

Modern Ghosts

Uncanny Stories. By May Sinclair. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

Changeling and Other Stories. By Donn Byrne. The Century Company. $2.

TODAY we are all of us more or less pragmatists, and even our ministers are busily engaged in destroying the fountain-head of religion by assuring us that this is a commonsense world. When we fear we generally fear quite tangible things, for the matter-of-fact light of noon which floods our existence is not conducive to that terror of the unknown which is terror indeed. Yet the ghost story can still sometimes evoke a very pleasant dread if only it is irrational enough, if only it is far enough away from our prosaic belief in a universe of natural law. When it can eerily suggest that the world has gone mad and can make us for a moment believe that the sane and commonplace regularity of nature, which our experience and our science have taught us to rely upon, has given way, so that any unheard of thing may happen, then abysses open before the imagination, and it is pleasant to realize vaguely for a moment the unstable and mysterious world in which our primitive ancestors lived in terror.

But such a thrill is purely atavistic and cannot be modernized. Any attempt to state mere common sense in the terms of the mystagogue is an abomination, and hence comes the failure of May Sinclair's seven stories of the supernatural which are far too rational to produce either wonder or terror. Miss Sinclair is neither primitive nor romantic, and the uncanny forces which she calls into play are born not of her religious sense (the only true begetter of the world of terror) but of her ethical earnestness, so that her stories have the coldness of theology instead of the glamor of legend. Each supernatural force works logically to punish some vice and the result may be edifying but is certainly not beautiful. When ghosts become reasonable the ghost story dies.

Where Their Fire Is Not Quenched and The Flaw in the Crystal are typical. In the first a woman who has a feeble little affair with a man she does not love is punished by being compelled to pass an eternity of loathsome union with him; in the second, Agatha Verall discovers that the mysterious power which she has of curing afflicted people is lost when her crystal is flawed by earthly love for one of her patients. Essentially these stories are mere moral fables, and the moral scheme which they exhibit is a rather anemic one at that, so that the stories not only fail to thrill but seem petty in addition. Surely Dante would never have deemed worthy of hell and the unquenchable fires so tepid a sinner as the heroine of the first story who was hardly guilty of anything more terrible than vulgarity. Sin, if there is such a thing, is surely something more important and passionate than a lapse in taste, and Byron's fancy of a God who said on the judgment day to trembling mankind, "Fools go your way, do you suppose I would take the trouble to damn such creatures as you?" would seem quite adequate for her case. Only a very vulgar God would find it worth while to punish such a vulgarian. If in our fiction we are to upset the world it should be for something worth disturbing nature for.

If Miss Sinclair did not have her remarkable power of telling almost any story with amazing succinctness she would not, in the present case, stir the reviewer to so much protest, but it is maddening to see such skill wasted upon such trivial material. She cannot but arouse a certain amount of interest and admiration but essentially these stories are ghostly only in their complete unreality. They suggest not a passionate sense of life and a rich experience but a very skilful juggling with imagined incidents and hypothetical motives—the work of a person who has spent her time in perfecting artifice rather than in observation or experience. Miss Sinclair would call before our imaginations the unknown world beyond the limits of human experience, but there broods over her work a spirit which seems to come not from the vast mysteries but from some quiet, curtained room where a retired lady moves decorously about to the accompaniment of the discreet rustlings of her silk. She has in the past sometimes described greatly a very limited world but she is lost when she strays even into the more passionate world which we know, let alone when she would penetrate the immensities.

Mr. Donn Byrne, on the other hand, could no doubt write excellent ghost stories if he liked; he has the sense of wonder. But the everyday world seems to him so delightful and so strange that he is not tempted to go elsewhere, and he can make a metropolitan courtroom seem more uncanny than Miss Sinclair's Beyond. No other contemporary writer of fiction save James Stevens is so naively or unashamedly romantic and few, if any, are better able to hypnotize the reader into believing that this drab world is as glamorous as fairyland. If one were able to examine his plots in cold blood many of them might seem both preposterous and a little bit cheap in their unrestrained romanticism, but his exuberance and the rich poetry of his language hold the critical faculty prisoner and one listens to him as one listens to some inspired liar—as, for instance, the poor harassed mother listened to Peer Gynt and his ravishing fabrications.

His secret, I think, is merely the secret of sincerity. He writes romantically not because he believes that "people have enough of the unpleasant in their own lives" or because we "ought to look on the bright side of things," but simply because, being endowed very richly with one of the famous Celtic temperaments, he sees everything invested with the glamor of his own enthusiasm. There is a folk twang to his speech and a folk twang to his poetry which is born naturally from the hunger for wonder so characteristic of his race. Drunk with life and drunk with words, he rushes along so exuberantly and joyfully that we can only stop in amazed gratification to find that a soul so genuinely naive can inhabit the body of a modern writer and invest rather foolish stories with such glamor. He and some of his fellow-Irishmen have a flavor which is unique in modern literature.

Our Changing Constitution

Recent Changes in American Constitutional Theory. By John W. Burgess. Columbia University Press. $1.75.

MR. BURGESS enjoys the distinction of being the creator of the first school of political science in America. By wise academic statesmanship he picked some of his students for training abroad in jurisprudence, legal history, and public law, found them posts as teachers of history to sophomores, and then with their aid developed a graduate school devoted to the study of the art or science or philosophy or practice of government. Now, over a decade after his retirement from active teaching, he surveys the recent changes in American constitutional theory and practice in a small volume designed especially, as he says, for the more than ten thousand students whom he has been privileged to instruct, as a "maybe, final word from their old teacher." It will not distress him that the welcome extended by them to this testament does not carry full agreement with all its clauses; for he closes his introduction with the wisdom that intolerance of difference of opinion is death to our free institutions and that such difference must be not merely tolerated and respected but "must be sought, invited, and encouraged, for only through the clash of opinion and the attrition of thought can man press onward toward the goal of truth and the perfection of civilization."

Such difference of opinion is certain to be engendered by Mr. Burgess's study of constitutional theory. Agreement and disagreement will alternate from page to page. To followers of herded opinion the author's judgments on recent constitutional changes will seem a strange motley of brands and mavericks. There are laments dear to the editorial hearts of the New York Times, the New York Nation, and what was yesterday the New York Call. It was a mistake to pass the income-tax amendment, the prohibition amendment, and the woman-suffrage amendment. We have violated cherished constitutional principles of the Fathers in compelling conscripts to fight a foreign war, in loaning money to foreign governments, and in forbidding men to speak ill of our form of government and jailing them for expression of opinion. The Espionage Law found another name for treason and thereby escaped the constitutional restrictions on definition and punishment of treason. The Spanish War was unnecessary and unwise, and participation in the League of Nations would be worse. Such conclusions, viewed loosely, make Mr. Burgess seem a man divided against himself. Yet those familiar with his philosophic foundations and his modes of reasoning will anticipate that the interesting and significant attraction of his essay is the manner in which these superficial diversities are shown to have an inner unity.

Mr. Burgess derives his principles of "sound political science" from some fundamental concepts reached by a priori reasoning and validated, he believes, by experience. Of these the primary one is the separation of government from the supreme power in a state. As a necessary corollary there must be the duly reserved constitutional immunities of the individual protected by an independent judiciary. For government of wide areas there must be the restriction of the powers of the central government to the scope of interests plainly national. In the past our American system admirably clung to these ideals. Of late years we have been forsaking them. Obviously the national income tax, the war and the Volstead Act greatly exalted the national government at the expense of both the states and the individual. Woman suffrage is somewhat harder to fit into the conceptual picture. The author does it by pointing out that women have always been the leaders in the fine enterprise of what he calls "voluntary socialism"—another name for charity. Now with the ballot they are likely to seek the same ends by political action and thus to promote "the gradual expansion of state socialism at the cost of the great American system of voluntary socialism, which has been our glory and safety."

While Mr. Burgess says that he has "undertaken to make a statement, to trace a historical movement, not to advance an argument or file a plea," it is not hard to discern where his own judgments lead him. What interests us most is the basis of those judgments. Do they come from the principles of "sound political science" discovered or evolved by the scholar through the use of some objective right reason in his study, as Mr. Burgess undoubtedly sincerely believes, or are they after all only the individual preferences of an individual man influenced by his environments, his tastes, and his interests, gathered up into a conceptual system which has room for them or which, if necessary, is unconsciously expanded to make room for them? This is a question which can never receive a hundred per cent answer. It must be a matter of more or less. It is easy to demonstrate that the so-called principles of constitutional law declared in Supreme Court decisions are in no small part the product of individual predilections of the judges. It is hard to doubt that the principles of sound political science are not also of fallible human origin. Certainly the process of government will not follow the orderly concepts of the philosophic inquirer. Nevertheless, it is well to have such concepts set before us, and to be cautioned that we should think of the wisdom of the means we choose as well as the wisdom of the ends we seek. It is well to be brought face to face with the question whether we are consciously picking our way or are wandering blindly. Yet for all this it is hard to dismiss the doubt whether in such a human enterprise as government we can wisely steer our course by the beacon of ideal principles assumed to be inherent in some wise natural order. Mr. Burgess must find most of us more consciously pragmatic in our judgments than he is and must leave some of us wondering whether his own judgments are not more personal and more pragmatic than he is aware. ## A Real Interpretation

Mexico: An Interpretation. By Carleton Beals. B. W. Huebsch. $2.50.

MR. CARLETON BEALS is unusually well qualified to write of present-day Mexico. He lived intimately with the closing events of Carranza's rule. He has been a ringside witness of what he shrewdly calls the "revindicating revolution," the regime of Obregon, Calles, and De la Huerta. Travel in Spain gave him a first-hand acquaintance with Mexico's European heritage. Two years in Italy, sandwiched between his Mexican experiences, permitted close study of the rise and collapse of its proletarian movement and the coming of Fascismo. To this special equipment he brings a luxuriant historical background, an unfettered mind, keen observation, and a broad human sympathy. "Mexico: An Interpretation," is the product of these qualifications.

The approach is but partly narrative. He unravels the various strands that make the Mexican fabric—the Mexican proletariat, the middle class, the aristocracy, the church, the military, the women, the foreigner. The color and movement of present-day Mexico seep through and through his craftsmanship—a rare blending of art and scientific fidelity. His hues are riotously flung; his words paint the crimsons, oranges, and purples of the Mexican blood, sunlight, and crowds and impart to them the caustic essence of the native red chile. His touch is daring, unfaltering, and searing; there is no special pleading. One interpretation invites questioning. "The pacific Maya," says Mr. Beals, "hates the Aztecs, Zapotecas, and Mixtecas." He foresees the secession of Yucatan, Quintana Roo, Tabasco, Chiapas, and Campeche, "the day a strong Central American republic is created." This is assuming a good deal. Given an unhindered development the Guatemalan Mayas would be more likely to seek, through annexation with Mexico, the emancipation which they see their Yucatecan blood brothers achieving. But this, too, is speculation.

What, too, is the basis for the sweeping statement "the Mestizo though more Indian than Spanish has less moral integrity than the former. He is skilled in treachery, cunning, and self-seeking." This disposal of half of Mexico's people seems at variance with Mr. Beals's otherwise level-eyed questioning of widespread assumptions. His indorsement gives the statement strength, but one longs for evidence. Nor is he easy to follow, when after the unsparing condemnation of a cold recital of the facts in President Wilson's Mexican "policy" he concludes: "It cannot be gainsaid that he broadened and liberalized the Monroe Doctrine; and his idealism, however misdirected, cannot upon this point be questioned." Why not? Haiti and Santo Domingo are throbbing interrogation points. The unwarranted bombardment of Vera Cruz and the subsequent abandonment of really endangered Americans in Tampico have led some Americans to conclude that at best President Wilson rationalized as "idealism" his prejudices, antipathies, his determination that what he conceived to be, must be.

Omission from the book of mention of the new cultural efforts in Mexico is doubtless due to Mr. Beals's connection with the Department of Education. Less explicable is the abrupt disposal of the complex agrarian tangle which he leaves by saying simply "The problem is now to modernize the ejido system." Of course modernization (in consonance with the aspirations of her people) is the problem of every phase of Mexican life. Working out this problem is something else.

To point out that a few of Mr. Beals's brilliant portraits seem slightly overcolored, that his selection of a few cases of incest merely weakens his condemnation of the Mexican aristocracy, that his American colony pictures its worst and to some extent its departed elements, is not to alter my judgment that on the whole his book is an extraordinary achievement in artistic photography, shrewd analysis, and masterly condensation. It has lifted the steadily rising level of contemporary literature about Mexico several notches. Like Bertrand Russell in his "Problem of China" Mr. Beals has accomplished the unusual feat of creating a book worth reading even by those who have no especial interest in the country described. It is a contribution to current world thought.

In the Image of Bigness

Birds, Beasts and Flowers. By D. H. Lawrence. Thomas Seltzer. $2.50.

THE title of Mr. Lawrence's new volume of poems might have been "Men, Women and Frogs"; it might have been "Tulips and Chimneys"; it might have been anything. For although Mr. Lawrence looked at birds, beasts, and flowers and wrote a book, he saw in those things only what he was born to see, and he saw it with the same kind of energy that he has displayed in all his books, whatever their subjects. No volume better than this one, and it is his best effort in poetry so far, reveals the quality of the gaze with which he fixes the world—a fierce and sullen gaze, groping and grasping and hugging tight. And no volume, perhaps, is so forcible an affirmation of the dark truth which for him exists beneath the pale surfaces of life.

He looks at the lava congealed on the slopes of Etna, and cries:

> "My heart will know no peace
> Till the hill bursts."

He looks at the grape, and remembers with anger that portions of mankind have forgotten how to be drunk.

> "Soberness, sobriety.
> It is like the agonized perverseness of a child heavy with sleep, > yet fighting, fighting to keep awake;
> Soberness, sobriety, with heavy eyes propped open."

Whenever he looks at people—and he hates people—he sees them gray, correct, and hard. He is bored by the ideal intellect that freezes and rarefies the universe; he wants the distant dusk again, wherein all things seem large and strangely powerful. He is sick of the flatness of democracy; he is enraged by the proprieties of the great middle mass:

> "I long to see its chock-full crowdedness
> And glutted squirming populousness on fire
> Like a field of filthy weeds
> Burnt back to ash,
> And then to see the new, real souls sprout up.
> Not this vast rotting cabbage-patch we call the world;
> But from the ash-scarred fallow
> New wild souls."

Much as he scorns the ideas of Walt Whitman, like Whitman he asks that the world be made over in the image of bigness.

Like Whitman, too, he often is incoherent and merely strident; but when he hits he hits like thunder. His utterance, usually prose, has a way of becoming, through sheer energy and insistence, prophetic and so poetic. He cannot or will not work for an effect in the ordinary way. He despises the patience with which most poets refine their lines until they can penetrate the imag-

The pieces here on Persephone, on humming birds, on goats, on asses, on fishes, on snakes, are masterpieces in their kind. And one had better get out of the way of his elephants:

"The best is the Pera-hera, at midnight, under the tropical stars,
With a pale little wisp of a Prince of Wales, diffident, up in a small pagoda on the temple side
And white people in evening dress buzzing and crowding the stand upon the grass below and opposite:
And at last the Pera-hera procession, flambeaux aloft in the tropical night, of blazing cocoanut,
Naked dark men beneath,
And the huge frontal of three great elephants stepping forth to the tom-tom's beat, in the torchlight,
Slowly sailing in gorgeous apparel through the flamelight, in front of a towering, grimacing white image of wood."

The American Jail

Crucibles of Crime. By Joseph F. Fishman. Cosmopolis Press. $2.

WHEN, in 1921, at the semi-centennial meeting of the American Prison Association, Dr. Hastings Hart, in making his report on County Jails, said, "Men and women of the American Prison Association, I charge you with fifty years of neglect of the most hopeful and most deserving part of our prison population," he spoke the conviction of all thoughtful students of penology in the United States. Joseph F. Fishman adds renewed emphasis to this charge of neglect in his recent volume on the American jail—"Crucibles of Crime."

Perhaps the reason for the neglect of these institutions by the public is contained upon the title-page of his book. There you will find beneath his name these words: "For many years the only inspector of prisons for the United States Government in territory embracing the United States, Alaska, and Porto Rico; and independent prison investigator and consultant for Federal, State, and Municipal governments." Surely, with but a single light-bringer, it is quite understandable why public opinion in America has been inert and indifferent to the problem about which the American people have never been adequately informed.

If Mr. Fishman's voice has been single thus far, he has now taken our most characteristic and perhaps most effective means for its multiplication—the publishing of a book of his findings. The volume is a sustained and searching indictment of our American jails of which he has visited approximately fifteen hundred during the past sixteen years. No section of the country is omitted from his general indictment, and few jails in the country are excluded from his condemnation. "As they stand at present the jails of the United States, generally speaking, are giant crucibles of crime. Into them are thrown helter-skelter the old, the young, the guilty, the innocent, the diseased, the healthy, the hardened, and the susceptible, there to be mixed with further ingredients of filth, vermin, cold, darkness, stagnant air, overcrowding, bad plumbing, and all brought to a boil by the fires of complete idleness. Only the strongest material can resist such fusion."

His volume is a record of human degradation—the product of public indifference, of administrative incompetence and ignorance, and political exploitation which has acquired national proportions. It is an outspoken record of fact that makes it a good report and in some cases a moving report, in spite of its many literary defects.

Throughout the book there is a certain inevitableness about the horror of conditions in American jails. It seems to be an evil thing out of which evil alone comes. Yet Mr. Fishman assures us that the main requirements for remedying these conditions are "common sense and some intelligent attention to the matter." He enumerates some specific remedies that would eliminate the present revolting conditions, and each one in turn seems to be informed by common sense and practical experience.

Yet, as one lays down the book, one realizes that facts—even facts vividly presented—will not compel a remedy. Social change is not a question of fact but of social purpose. It will require the burning zeal of men who care about their fellow-men, who see with a clear vision what the social purpose of our American jail should be, and who can and will interpret this new purpose to the citizenship. The public needs the presence of vibrant personalities—such as a John Howard or an Elizabeth Fry of a century ago, or a Thomas Mott Osborne of our own time.

SPENCER MILLER

A Feminist's Point of View

Women of the French Revolution. By Winifred Stephens. E. P. Dutton and Company. $5.

THAT Winifred Stephens is a feminist can be deduced without knowing any more about her than what is to be gathered from this book. It is apparent everywhere—in her indignation at the discrimination of revolutionary legislation against her sex, in her refusal to subscribe to the conventional conceptions of feminine inferiority, in her frequent allusions to the political indifference of many modern Frenchwomen of note. Her original desire and intention probably were, therefore, to write a history of the feminist movement during the French Revolution. But such a task would have involved a thorough study of an extensive field and that, she frankly admits, she did not attempt. As her abundant footnotes indicate, her sources were almost entirely the secondary works of her predecessors in the field—among others, Michelet, the De Goncourts, Laserre, Aulard—and the memoirs of some of the women considered. But if she was unprepared to write a history of the feminist movement, she was not satisfied simply with giving short biographical sketches of the leading female figures of the revolution. She chose, consequently, a hybrid form of presentation, devoting about a chapter to each of the chief activities of the women of the French Revolution—agitation, the salons, writing, fighting, religion, feminism, divorce—and relating, as they appeared, the stories of the outstanding exponents of each activity.

Miss Stephens foresaw that this method would have its shortcomings, "one of which is some slight repetition," and attempted to obviate this by frequent references ante and post in her footnotes. Unfortunately the repetition is more than slight; it is sufficient to be disconcerting and confusing. The phases of Mme Roland's career, for example, are discussed in several different chapters, and because she is given most space in an early one on Women Writers, in the fields of the revolution where she exerted greater influence she receives less attention than others not so important. Furthermore, in restricting herself to only a few of the aspects of the revolution in which women were involved, Miss Stephens was able to give to Marie Antoinette but incidental consideration, and to Mme Tallien, whose chief significance lies in her share of the responsibility for the end of the Reign of Terror, only brief mention as an anti-feminist.

But if there are some things left out of the book that ought to have been included, there are almost as many included that ought to have been left out. Why a number of men like Condorcet, Roland, and Camille Desmoulins were dragged (by their wives' necks, as it were) into a work of this nature is not clear. Nor is it any more reasonable that the story of how Mme Legros, who is not again referred to, secured the liberation of the Marquis de Latude from the Bastille in 1784 should be included in a book which professes to deal only with events from May, 1789, to July, 1794. This intrusion of foreign matter is all the more remarkable because the author otherwise keeps carefully within the chronological limits she set herself, even is largely a matter of "shopping" in The Chicago Daily News' Special Christmas Book Section issued December 8th.

Christmas Book Buying in Chicago

Regularly, in its Wednesday Book Pages, The Daily News carries more book advertising than any other newspaper, daily or Sunday, in Chicago. It is thus recognized by experienced publishers as the outstanding medium in Chicago for the sale of books. (In the first 10 months of 1923, The Daily News printed 124,617 lines of book advertising as against 81,684 lines printed by the paper having the next highest score—The Daily Tribune.)

The Special Christmas Book Section of The Daily News, issued in addition to the regular Wednesday Book Page, is well advertised in advance of publication, and is eagerly awaited by the Chicago book buying public.

Publishers who place their selling messages in this section will be assured the interested attention of the great Chicago reading public.

G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS NEW YORK

to the point of ending her book somewhat in medias res, at the point where women's clubs were banned by the Convention. This occurred months before July, 1794, but the feminist author naturally considered women's political parties the climax of her story and put it last, with the result that the chapter ends where it ought, but the book does not.

Being a woman and an Englishwoman to boot, Miss Stephens finds it hard to regard the revolution as something more than the Reign of Terror. This may be because she sees the revolution through the eyes of those whose memoirs she has read. Despite the fact that many of the women of whom she tells succeeded in living until well into the nineteenth century, she indorses the implication of Sieyès that it was a sufficient accomplishment to have remained alive during the revolution. To read Miss Stephens's book without a previous knowledge of the revolution would leave one with the notion that of the 25,000,000 people who inhabited France in 1789 there must have been only about 10,000,000 or 15,000,000 left in 1794. (As a matter of fact there were no more than 20,000 or 30,000 civil executions all told between 1789 and 1794 in all of France.) For Miss Stephens, Robespierre, despite Mr. Mathiez's interpretation, is still the "sea-green monster" of Carlyle's imagination. Charlotte Corday, a silly girl whose only title to fame lies in a futile murder, is still the "angel of assassination" of Lamartine's poetic fantasy. The virtuous Mme Roland is still a "rabid republican" long before the revolution (even if she did seek a title of nobility for her husband). And the Enragés, worried chiefly about profiteers and the price of bread, still are socialists. Quae cum ita essent, no wonder so few achieved "the miracle of living throughout the Revolution"!

The history of the women of the French Revolution yet remains to be written. The writer, whether English or French or American, man or woman, feminist or anti-feminist, sympathetic or unsympathetic, will have to see the revolution not alone through the eyes of the women he writes about, but through the aid of the memoirs of the men as well and of the newspapers, parliamentary and club debates, contemporary books, pamphlets, diaries, journals and correspondence, and in the light of the most recent historical investigation. Miss Stephens's undertaking is more inclusive than Michelet's work of the same title and more profound than Haggard's, but it still leaves much to be desired. LOUIS R. GOTTSCHALK

The Nazarene Again!

The Man Himself. By Rollin Lynde Hartt. Doubleday, Page and Company. $2.50.

Some Aspects of the Life of Jesus. By George Berguer. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.50.

THE clear, stimulating atmosphere of these two books on Jesus brings to mind, by contrast, the stifling miasma of Papini's "Life of Christ" which has been monopolizing attention in recent months. The Italian's alleged biography added nothing either to our knowledge or understanding of the Nazarene; it simply repeated the sentimental romanticisms of Dean Farrar and his school, with an appalling admixture of bad scholarship and worse theology. Yet the work was widely read and rapturously acclaimed. One can hardly hope for such a reception of the two sterling books under review, and the fact is to the discredit of the American public, especially of its religious leaders.

Mr. Hartt's book is brave, honest, brilliant, and useful. It is literary, even journalistic, rather than scholarly in style, but it has a background of scholarship which is as accurate as it is adequate. Mr. Hartt has gone to the Bible with a fresh, open mind and the modern spirit, and has read its pages as he would read any other book, or books, for information. "Toward the end," he says "a sublime figure emerges." Tearing away from this figure all mythical and legendary elements—the miracles, the virgin birth, the resurrection; casting out all "theological addenda"—the incarnation, the atonement, the trinity; avoiding discussion of the Nazarene's career, to which he devotes fewer pages than the eighteen in Bousset's famous volume, the author takes us straight to "the man himself," and presents him as a young Jewish rabbi, of marked limitations, who "could make mistakes," parochial in knowledge and experience, but of flawless character and profound spiritual insight, a man who gave himself heroically to the service of an unselfish cause, and left behind him an example of virtue and a record of wisdom which prove him to be "the greatest religious genius of all time."

Central in Jesus's life and teaching, and therefore in any understanding of the man, Mr. Hartt places the idea of the second coming. "Only by taking seriously his belief in his second coming . . . can we determine what manner of man he was. He held that belief with entire conviction. It was his central idea. All his other ideas radiated from it." It explains, says Mr. Hartt, Jesus's indifference to Roman rule in his country, to slavery and the subjection of women, to all problems of political and economic life. It explains his action in "discrediting family affection," his "manifestly impractical notions about property," his amazing self-assertion. It makes clear the character of his death as a martyrdom deliberately sought in fulfilment of Messianic prophecy. The idea, of course, was mistaken. Jesus was the victim of an illusion. But "it gave him his mission," and served as the vehicle of the sublimest religious teaching in the history of the world.

We read Mr. Hartt's book with reservations. We are not convinced that the idea of the second coming is so centrally important as he makes it. We find it difficult to understand Jesus in that last tremendous week in Jerusalem as an actor playing a role in a preconceived Messianic drama. Our memory of the writings of Walter Rauschenbusch rises up to confute the assertion that the Nazarene had no interest or part in social reforms. We are certain that Mr. Hartt undervalues the moral worth of the Old Testament, and is almost absurdly blind to the significance of the prophets whom he delights to style mere "dervishes." But these reservations diminish not a whit our admiration for his work. Its independence, boldness, originality are beyond all praise. We know of few books to match it for sheer vividness and power.

Mr. Berguer's volume brings us what we have been long anticipating—a psychoanalytical study of the life of Jesus. The book is as scholarly as Mr. Hartt's book is popular in style. Introductory chapters on methods and sources, footnotes, an appendix, an eight-page bibliography, and a full index, all combine to reveal the author as a trained scholar, engaged in the task of presenting a work of careful original research. Yet the book is fascinating reading, thanks in part to an admirable translation by Eleanor and Van Wyck Brooks.

Mr. Berguer is as uncompromising as Mr. Hartt in his separation of the "half-legendary, half-dogmatic" from "what is strictly historical in the gospels." His approach to the problem, however, is different. He is not content to stop with the record itself, and show what is false and true therein. He makes it his particular task to go behind the record, and show what the false as well as the true may mean. The gospels are the product, in other words, not only of events but of souls working upon events. They reveal "the psychology of those who have spoken in them"—"the psychology of the first Christian community . . . the psychology of the author of the gospel of John . . . finally, the psychology of Christ Himself." Professor Berguer wants to find and reveal these psychologies; and he does this by treating the gospels not so much as a narrative of outward historical events as a projection of inward spiritual states.

Using the now familiar principles of psychoanalysis, clearly exposited in the opening chapter, the author takes up certain aspects of the life of Jesus, and explains them from his especial viewpoint. The birth, the tales of childhood and youth, the baptism and temptation, the miracles, the transfiguration, the death

ROBERT M. McBRIDE & COMPANY

Publishers 7 West 16th Street New York and resurrection, fall in turn beneath his exacting scrutiny. In all the purely legendary element is stripped away, to reveal the workings of certain individual souls, and the great "popular soul" itself, "in the presence of a heroic and admirable life such as that of Jesus was," and more especially of course the soul of Christ, a sublime spiritual genius seeking to make men over into the likeness of the divine which he had found and realized within himself. We are not competent to judge of the soundness of this method of interpretation. We can only record the illumination it has brought to our mind, the profound reverence with which the author has prosecuted his task, and the noble beauty of the person of the Nazarene which is left when his task is done.

These two books must be anathema to Christian orthodoxy. They will give many a shock to liberals. But together, in their drastic emphasis upon modern methods of historical and psychological analysis, they indicate admirably the direction in which all future study of the Nazarene is certain to move.

Victorian Byways

Studies in Victorian Literature. By Stanley T. Williams. E. P. Dutton and Company. $3.

MR. WILLIAMS has evolved the subject matter of these studies according to a plan well tested by the critical essayists who are enjoying vogue at the present time. "I have written them," he explains in his foreword, "as an expression of the belief that one may learn much concerning an age by haunting its by-paths."

The furbishing up of a tarnished literary reputation or the "discovery" of an author ignored by posterity (and like as not by his contemporaries) is often a piquant business. But Mr. Williams has a capacity for gravity which makes his revaluations of Victorian literature somewhat different in temper from what we have come to expect of the literary historian when he addresses a general public. These essays reveal the sort of miscellaneousness with captivates interest, for they have to do either with obscure names, or hidden and more or less unsuspected aspects of the great—the relations of Landor and Matthew Arnold to their contemporaries; the Mid-Victorian criticisms of George Brimley; the contrasted boyhoods of J. S. Mill and Edmund Gosse; Kingsley's "Yeast"; Newman's literary preferences; the unusual "serenity" of Carlyle's "Life of John Sterling"; and the future of "Past and Present."

This is an incomplete, but representative, list of the contents of Mr. Williams's Victorian studies, and substantiates his conviction that "disparate as they are, each book or person here thought worthy of an essay projects a tendency of the Victorian era." He touches the Christian Socialist and Tractarian movements in essays upon the chief figures in each—Kingsley and Newman, the former related to his day by "Yeast," that "singular combination of Platonic dialogue, tract, sermon, diatribe, and ballad," the latter by his secular literary preferences—Cicero, Addison, Thackeray, Bacon (for style, not philosophy), Milton (for poetry, not theology), and George Herbert (for style, philosophy, poetry, and theology).

In several respects the volume fails to meet one's legitimate expectations in the way of scope and variety. That is explicable, of course, from the fact that the essays have been collected for book publication from periodicals, and that some have little connection with the rest other than physical contiguity. Thus we have four essays on Matthew Arnold's poetry, considered theoretically, technically, and historically, but nothing on the scientific agnosticism of the age as represented, say, in Herbert Spencer. There are included discussions of Clough's prose and Landor's sense of superiority, but nothing on such an energetic controversialist of the day as Thomas Huxley. There are "Two Poems by Rossetti" but nothing of that curious aspect of nineteenth century humanism—the positivism of Frederic Harrison and his fellow-Comtians. For these lacunae which definitely limit the scope of the book we may better blame the circumstances of compilation than Mr. Williams. At his threshold it is more just to lay our burden of disappointment that he did not bring his intimate knowledge of the literature of Victoria's reign to bear upon the general public with a more insinuating and jocund pen, and that, in dealing with general ideas, he could not have divested himself of his skill with scholia.

Mirrors of Paris

As They Are: French Political Portraits. Anonymous. Translated by Winifred Katzin. Alfred Knopf. $2.50.

THE American boys who arrived in war-time France expecting to find every Frenchman a Roland and every Frenchwoman a Jeanne d'Arc suffered grievous disillusionment. But some of them liked the French they discovered better than the illusions they lost.

There is little illusion in these portraits. The anonymous writer is very French. If one is looking for an American-made "Mirrors of Paris" done with a wealth of newspaper anecdote he will not find it; here is graceful persiflage (a little weight added in the course of translation) and rapier comment spiced with philosophy. Here is the pepper of malice for Caillaux and Painlevé, and even for Herriot and Briand—the author hates all men of the Left. His admiration is keen for Foch and Poincaré, but keener still for André Lefèvre and Millerand. Loucheur, Tardieu, Barthou, Viviani—they all pass in review. To win his enthusiasm one must be not only conservative but a renegade radical, preferably a skeptic turned Catholic. But his prejudices do not prevent his search, not for the incident, but for the philosophy of these politicians' careers.

He knows French politics, as the political writers of the French newspapers—who usually nourish political ambitions themselves—do. He dwells upon the extraordinary fact that for twenty years after the Dreyfus Affair, whatever changes were made in prime ministers, the so-called Radical Party held the post of Minister of the Interior, and thereby swung elections; and he rejoices that Poincaré has for the first time broken the charm and installed Maurice Maunoury in the Place Beauvau. Even Maunoury is not quite "Moderate" enough to please him (it is one of the significant curiosities of French politics that a conservative is called a Moderate, a mild liberal a Radical, and that "Socialist" is a loose term which in this country would include anyone who did not want to lease the post office to the late Mr. Wanamaker).

Knowing French politics, he is cynical. "In this country, where military heroism is current coin, civil heroism, or even ordinary civil decency, is almost nowhere to be found," he sagely reflects. He insists, rightly, that the French is the most middle-class of nations, and he dwells upon the association of that class with "the financial oligarchy, which is the veritable if anonymous government of our country." He emphasizes that instinctive thrift which, as the doughboys discovered, is one of the dominant traits of French character. Many mediocre politicians, he says, have jumped to fame when they touched finance. "Let figures, budgets, the national housekeeping accounts be called in question, and immediately the French bourgeois comes uppermost. For be he great or small the French bourgeois is so near to the dour French peasant, he has been brought up in such a school of domestic economy, his personal affairs are in such excellent order, that he burns to restore the same order to the affairs of the nation." That is penetrating comment, but, unfortunately, French character includes another contradictory trait which the author shares but ignores—a passion for glory, even though it be empty.

While this volume, by a former editor of The Century, portrays substantially a life of activity in public affairs, a prevailing sense of humor gives buoyancy to the narrative of even the most serious happenings: After describing the life of an impressionable boy in Indiana, before and during the Civil War, Mr. Johnson tells of going to New York as a stripling to join the staff of Scribner's Monthly, later The Century, with which he was importantly connected for forty years. ## Portraits, Rather

Roman Pictures. By Percy Lubbock. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.

THE narrator who speaks so wittily, so naturally, and so engagingly from the pages of "Roman Pictures" presents himself in the first paragraph loitering on an afternoon, long years ago, by the pretty little Fountain of the Tortoises, after "having drifted hither and thither about Rome, from the Gate of the People to the Baths of Caracalla—drifted day after day in my solitude through a month of April more divinely blue and golden than the first spring-days of the world; and whether I was in the body or out of the body I scarcely knew; for I moved in a great bubble of imagination." Desirous for something to break into his solitude and his dream, "not that I was tired of either, but because my dream and my solitude would be still more beautiful if I could look at them for an hour across an interval," he is met by Deering—Deering who speaks and dresses and poses in Italian, Deering the superior, who looks down from the height of six whole months of experience in Rome, patronizingly counsels his friend to "come out of books," and generously offers to start him on the way to acquaintance with "the real Rome," the city unsuspected by the ordinary gaping tourist.

Deering goes off with his friend to no such banal scenes as the Palatine or the ilex-shadows and gray spaces of an evening on the Aventine and in the further country, but to a plush-and-gilt-and-mirrored café in the Via Nazionale, where they meet with real Rome in the persons of Bannock, an American singer out for the conquest of Europe, who knows exactly what is the matter with opera in Rome and why his conquest is being delayed, with Jaffrey, a slender and shabby dancer who knows all about the circumstances that are keeping him from his own, and with Edna, Jaffrey's partner in dancing and cockney and the ambition to emigrate to America and sure success.

This is the manner in which Deering, who modestly mentions once or twice that "there seems to be something of the Italian in me," gives his friend "a push, with his benediction, and one thing led to another, and I started to collect Roman pictures of a new sort"; and this is the reason why the reader will not find in "Roman Pictures" the more or less untidy mingling of history, description, anecdote, gossip, and sentiment that experience leads him to expect in all but scholastic books on Rome, but the narrative of a series of encounters with a variety of persons, most of them visitors or sojourners in the city, most of them as snobbishly superior as Deering himself in the conviction that they alone possess the secret of the real Rome, and all of them so individual that the reader feels like renaming this book of Mr. Lubbock Roman Portraits instead of Roman Pictures.

These pictures do indeed include glimpses of the real Rome of the other and more familiar sort, as in the great roaring church when the high swaying throne, borne upon the shoulders of faithful knaves, comes down the lane between the throngs assembled, with its "ancient white-robed figure that sits aloft, springing upright and subsiding again with outstretched hand, and a smile, a fixed immemorial smile in a blanched face, beneath a pair of piercing eyes: Rome, Rome, indeed;" or as when the day begins as crystal, towers to its height in azure and gold, sinks to evening over the shadowy plain in pearl and wine; but these exquisite graces are not the stuff of the volume.

"Roman Pictures" is the book of a penetrating judge of character, a satiric observer of manners, and an accomplished literary artist. It will appeal most strongly to those familiar with English and American society in Rome, but will be enjoyed and admired by all who appreciate a finished style, a well-knit unity, and a well-governed satiric mood.

In a Magic Country

Barrie Marvell. By Charles Vince. Little, Brown and Company. $2.

THE very fact that this book might be placed in any category of juvenile literature from "Jack the Giant Killer" to "The Diary of a Young Girl" indicates how inapplicable would be any sort of classification of its contents. Mr. Vince has presented a boy who seeks to interpret his childish experiences in terms of the legends and fairy tales he knows and loves. Sometimes the things that Barrie Marvell draws into his magic country do not live up to the immutable code of fairy land; the picture of two beautiful ladies is removed before he, as Prince, has chosen one of them for his Princess; or the unkempt garden ceases to be an impenetrable jungle because a stupid uncle, all unaware that his palpable imitation is destroying the illusion, insists on roaring like a lion behind the shrubbery. Sometimes his mother and other gifted "grown-ups" can enter into the spirit of his imaginings and play the game through to the end; the three young men, for instance, who turned into true fairies making wishes of great import and giving presents of magical powers!

But whether our imaginative youngster is shocked by the contacts with concrete reality or whether his dream world is vindicated by the sympathy of adults, the incidents are, in the main, trivial and overemphasized. The author's pursuit of beauty seems as futile as a puppy's chase of a butterfly. For though Mr. Vince writes simply, placidly, and well, he cannot make his narrative more interesting by virtue of his prose. To be sure, it is not the offensive monotony of a trombonist practicing the scales but rather the gentle sameness of a tinkling cowbell on a hillside. And many a sentimental soul, strange to sylvan scenes, has found such tinkling a mainspring for ecstasy!

Had Mr. Vince found more of such matter as The Three Fairies is made of, he would have added color and variety to his story. For the zest and verve of that chapter are the results of a truer perspective and a more subtle realization of values. It is distinguished from the rest because there he conceives Barrie Marvell as the center of an adult world, a world we know, appreciate, and are interested in; whereas the other chapters present the boy in a universe of his own creation, a sphere far too small to deserve the exploring, the sounding and mapping, that the author deems necessary.

Books in Brief

Injun Babies. By Maynard Dixon. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.75.

Mr. Dixon's "seven stories about Injun babies and one about a fish" were originally written and illustrated for his little daughter, Constance, who spent many months with her father while he was painting down in the Navajo country. A-Wáy-She-Go, the runaway girl, So-Bée-Yit, the boy who got brave, O-Só-Sti-ki, the greedy girl, and No-Páh-no-Mah, the-long-time-alone boy, and all the other Injun babies live very near to nature. The big winds, the blue mountains, the fires of chips and pine needles and sweet grass "with its nice white smoke," the birds, the animals, the snake, and the horny toad appear in the stories again and again. They are the friends the Indian children turn to for help and to whom they sing their magic songs. The stories are for little children, but the humor in them appeals to older ones as well, and the story of So-Bée-Yit, the boy who got brave, has something in it for a child of all ages. There is a gay cover and the endpapers show a very busy Indian encampment. The illustrations are drawn with the strength and sincerity characteristic of all Maynard Dixon's work.

Sidelights on Negro Soldiers. By Charles H. Williams. B. J. Brimmer Company. $3.

A dispassionate, most entertainingly written, and informative account of the service of Negro combatant units, labor battalions, and civilians in the late war and of the various war-time organizations which worked with Negro troops as observed by one who for eighteen months investigated conditions affecting colored soldiers, under the auspices of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ and of the Phelps-Stokes Fund. Because of its total lack of bias or bitterness it is all the more a scathing arraignment of the alleged democracy of America toward her colored citizens. For example: "In Camp Lee, Petersburg, Va., a prayer-meeting was conducted in an area where Negro soldiers were located, but a soldier with a rifle on his shoulder was doing guard duty, pacing in a circle around the group to see that no Negroes attended." Mr. Williams tells, as well, of many Americans who in the stress of war were able to rise above the race prejudice which made the lot of these colored soldiers so difficult a one. He points out the amazing loyalty and self-sacrifice and devotion which Negro soldier and civilian alike demonstrated during the war, and the futility of this sacrifice in this "war to end war."

The Puppet Master. By Robert Nathan. Robert M. McBride and Company. $1.75.

Mr. Nathan's second novel continues in the vein of "Autumn" and "Youth Grows Old"—a vein which is very agreeable, but which surely cannot flow forever. The poems in "Youth Grows Old" were grave and fine because the author, a gifted young man, affected to be old and wished to be wise. "Autumn" took a similar tone; many tender things were said about life by one who was supposed to have lived quietly somewhere for a long time. Papa Jonas, the puppet master in the present book, is an old, moody man who pretends, along with the rest of the characters, that his puppets are alive, have love affairs, marry, think, laugh, weep, and converse. The careers of the puppets, like those of the real people about them, are in turn pathetic and gay, and there is opportunity for satire of a sort, of course. But the book in general is so gentle and so dull that one begins to wonder a little impatiently when Mr. Nathan will discover youth—when he will decide to see life closer up. He need not be less poetical then; he need only be less faint and far away.

Social Life in Ancient Egypt. By W. M. Flinders Petrie. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.

This is the forerunner of a more extensive work, the "Descriptive Sociology of Egypt," to be published in accordance with the will of Herbert Spencer. It is a thoroughly documented and intelligently arranged work, from which irrelevant and repetitious material has been rigorously winnowed, and well sustains the author's thesis that "nothing beyond what is self-developed in the brain of the race is permanently gained, or will survive the changes of time."

American Poetry Since 1900. By Louis Untermeyer. Henry Holt and Company. $3.50.

This is both a treatise and an anthology. It is based upon the author's "New Era in American Poetry" (1919), although much of it has been rewritten and entirely new sections have been added on Elinor Wylie, Jean Starr Untermeyer, George Santayana, Native Rhythms, and Other Voices. As an anthology the book is valuable throughout. As criticism it ranges all the way from gossip and vulgarity to the genuine thing. All of it is vigorous, and some of it is subtle. There are quantities of information.

Social and Diplomatic Memories. Second Series. By Sir J. Rennell Rodd. Longmans, Green and Company. $7.50.

A continuation of the first series, reviewed in The Nation of July 11. It is written in the same attractive style as the earlier volume, but is of less varied content and therefore of less general interest, as it deals wholly with the author's official service in Egypt under Lord Cromer from 1894 to 1901. This period covered the Fashoda incident and the remarkable mission to Abyssinia of which Sir Rennell himself was in charge in 1897. His story of this latter journey makes an interesting addition to the literature of travel. The book is notable also for its valuable appreciations of Kitchener and Cromer.

The Nation's Poetry Prize

THE NATION offers an annual poetry prize of $100 for the best poem submitted by an American poet in a contest conducted by The Nation each year between Thanksgiving and New Year's Day. The rules for the contest in 1923 are as follows:

1. Each manuscript submitted in the contest must reach the office of The Nation, 20 Vesey Street, New York City, not earlier than Saturday, December 1, and not later than Monday, December 31, plainly marked on the outside of the envelope, "For The Nation's Poetry Prize."
2. Manuscripts must be typewritten and must have the name of the author in full on each page of the manuscript submitted.
3. As no manuscripts submitted in this contest will in any circumstances be returned to the author it is unnecessary to inclose return postage. An acknowledgment of the receipt of each manuscript, however, will be sent from this office.
4. No more than three poems from the same author will be admitted to the contest.
5. No restriction is placed upon the subject or form of poems submitted, which may be in any meter or in free verse. It will be impossible, however, to consider poems which are more than 400 lines in length, or which are translations, or which are in any language other than English. Poems arranged in a definite sequence may, if the author so desires, be counted as a single poem.
6. The winning poem will be published in the Midwinter Literary Supplement of The Nation, to appear Feb'y 13, 1924.
7. Besides the winning poem, The Nation reserves the right to purchase at its usual rates any other poem submitted in the contest.

The judges of the contest are the editors of The Nation. Poems should in no case be sent to them personally.

bound in genuine leather or in full morocco. In these forms this famous new translation is more than ever a New Testament to be cherished and read with understanding and pleasure. It is a book to be owned and to be given to one's best friends.

In translating the New Testament into the language of today, Dr. Goodspeed has not sought to supplant the King James version, nor to replace its beautiful phrases with the slang of a rushing twentieth-century America. He has tried merely to make the Bible passages as easily understood by us all as they were by the common folk of ancient Greece. He has utilized the best of our modern scholarship to bring out the original meaning of the New Testament in a dignified and reverent way.

Victor Maurel, Singing Actor

JUST when the term singing actor entered into operatic parlance I do not know. Nor could the late Victor Maurel, though one of the most distinguished of the species, have been the first to illustrate it. On that point the testimony of history is unmistakable. Manuel Garcia and his two famous daughters, Maria Malibran and Pauline Viardot; Giuditta Pasta, acclaimed the lyric tragedienne of the eighteen-twenties; Wilhelmine Schröder-Devrient, the devastating effect of whose dramatic genius on the grand ducal audience of Pumpernickel has been recorded by Thackeray in quite his most affecting manner; the bass Lablache, who in at least one comic part, so Théophile Gautier tells us, buzzed about the stage like a gigantic and benevolent bumble bee; Sophie Cruvelli, Therese Tietiens, Ronconi, Obin, Niemann, Faure. . . . But why prolong a desultory and imperfect catalogue?

Tomaso Salvini is said to have retorted with asperity when somebody asked him whether it was true that he had coached a certain singer in the acting of an important operatic role that he had not coached this or any other singer, and added that he had yet to see the opera singer who could act at all! That opinion has been echoed by numberless other actors of the spoken drama. And yet so shrewd an observer as the late William F. Apthorp once wrote that the acting of Maurel and of Milka Ternina in opera was so utterly illusive that one felt it would be just as great in Shakespeare and Ibsen as in Wagner and Verdi.

As a matter of fact, some twenty years ago in Paris, Maurel did attempt the spoken drama. But after a few performances he gave it up, alleging as his reason that the technic of acting in spoken drama was too different for him to master at his age. The inference is clear that the acting of the lyric stage, though by no means the same as that of the so-called "dramatic" stage, is not necessarily bad (all the pump-handle tenors and semaphoric sopranos that afflict our eyes to the contrary notwithstanding). And it is worthy of note that some singing actors have crossed the bridge to the spoken drama with great success.

At any rate, Maurel was so much an actor that the older critics of the stage unblushingly compared his Iago with Booth's and Irving's, and his Falstaff in Verdi's opera admittedly outranked any other Falstaff, sung or spoken, of the last half century. One may judge the versatility of the artist from the fact that Maurel was supreme as Falstaff, as Rigoletto, and as Don Giovanni! Physically the Fat Knight and the deformed jester testified to a surpassing skill in make-up. Don Giovanni, Almaviva, and de Nevers happened to be the parts for which Maurel was born, for the gods were kind to him in stature, face, and figure, and no great noble of the court of Valois or of Bourbon ever wore the plumed hat with a loftier, a more patrician, grace.

In reminiscent enthusiasm for the actor in opera, it would never do at all to forget that Maurel was a singing actor. There was nothing about him of the half-baked shirker who imagines that a strong voice and a scant six months of hasty vocal preparation are all an "artist" needs to carry a flaming temperament to dizzy triumphs in "Carmen," "Tosca," and "L'Amore dei Tre Re." Otherwise he would not have been a singing actor for two score years. For his voice in its prime I have only the word of others. When I heard him he had long sung less with his voice than with his brain. But he was graduated from the Paris Conservatoire a first prize in vocal art at a time when that prize emphatically meant something, and to the end of his career he remained a most accomplished and polished singer—in the command of vocal color and nuance the superior of even Calvé and Chaliapin.

The Muscovites Return

THE Moscow Art Theater opened its return engagement with a new and admirable kind of play. From Dostoevski's "Brothers Karamazoff" M. Nemirovitch-Dantchenko has drawn a series of scenes far fuller than the fragmentary ones presented last year. But he has not attempted to dramatize, that is, to reorganize, the story in terms of another technique. A reader gives the audience the necessary connective narrative, so that the crucial scenes of the novel are presented to the audience precisely as they may be supposed to have played themselves on the theater of Dostoevski's mind. I thought at once of a similar treatment of "Vanity Fair" and of how great a moment in the theater the scene between Becky Sharp and the Marquis of Steyne would make. Here are, I think, endless possibilities quite free of the travesties of the process of dramatization.

It may have had something to do with my mood—such confessions spring not from arrogance but from a right critical humility—but the fact remains that the players from Moscow impressed me more deeply than they had ever done before. And I think I caught for the first time the inner secret of their preeminence. They do not play aspects or phases or dramatic abstracts of people, however pathetic or humorous or clever. They play whole characters. They have utterly and finally transcended the limitations of mere theatric characterization which Strindberg pointed out so many years ago. There is nothing left here of the tradition of "humors" which hangs on with so tough a persistence in the theater. You cannot describe the people who are being projected here any more easily than you can describe people in life whom you know so well that often you wonder whether you know them at all. The theater is conquered here, the theater which must die in order to live. Yes, the theater, like everything else and despite the pretty entertainments offered by the theatro-technical triflers, must heed the great command of "stirb und werde."

It is heeded here. How? What precisely is the secret of Luzhsky, Katchaloff, Leonidoff, of Yershoff and Podgorny? It is not a secret that can be expressed in terms of training, technique, artistic theorizing. These things are ultimately superficial. I do not know these men personally; I probably never shall; I do not know and do not care whether they are cultured and clever and earnest or the reverse. What I perceive in their playing, what gives them the power of playing as they do, is that they are or have been partakers of the very depths of human experience, that they have lived and sinned and suffered and known resurrection, that they have been partakers of despair and bitterness. Or, if by any chance these things have passed them by personally, they have lived with and beside them and in constant, spontaneous realization of their rootedness in life. Such acting does not and cannot come from lives lived on the outer surfaces of experience, of ball-games and tea-parties and that famous reserve and repression which is so often a hollow bladder spanning emptiness. Among these Russians, behind even the simplest act, there is an instinctive knowledge and acceptance of the tragic character of human life. . . .

Over on Forty-eighth Street the Equity Players are putting on a play by Mr. Walter Prichard Eaton, called "Queen Victoria." It was Mr. Eaton, it will be remembered, who declared that tragedy is not natural to the American people. Well, in this play the people are all painted dolls with one dimension or stalking abstract qualities of the superficially interesting kind, and the Gladstone dummy should be labeled "the orator," and the Disraeli marionette "the astute flatterer," and the Victoria doll "a good domestic woman," and Mr. Eaton and his actors—except the admirable mime who plays Albert and sees through the hollowness of it all—really and sincerely think that any adequate account of any kind or phase of human life can be given upon terms so shallow. No, man may be wickeder and wilder than that. He is not, thank heaven, so sapless. "Passions spin the plot." He who wrote that was a Victorian poet too.

In the third scene of "The Brothers Karamazoff" the coroner and the prosecutor come to tax Dmitry with the murder of his father. The parts of these two officials are taken by MM. Podgorny and Yershoff. The two parts are theatrically not of the first importance and M. Yershoff especially has but a few words to speak. He sits there and listens. Later he gets up and watches the proceedings and puts on his overcoat and draws on his gloves. Yet I shall never forget that long, white, tired, supercilious face, and I know now what a prosecutor under the Czarist regime was like and what this special prosecutor was like, and I could, I think, write the story of this particular provincial official who had a very low but quite unastonished opinion of human nature and amused himself with the dissipations, not too wild, of his province and cultivated the arts a little and had almost got beyond the chafing of ambition and indeed most human aches and to whom murder seemed more a vulgar thing than anything else and who was going from hearing the pleas and whines of Dmitry Karamazoff, convinced of his merely vulgar guilt, to dine a little wearily at the house of the governor of the province, of whose wife he was quite fond. . . . A theater, you see, that has died to live. "Stirb und werde!"

SPEAKING of contempt, nothing could be more contemptible than the course of Attorney General Daugherty and President Coolidge in the case of Comptroller Craig of New York City. He is not pardoned, but his sentence of sixty days in jail for criticizing Judge Mayer is "remitted," an action which it is expressly stated does not constitute a vindication. In other words Mr. Craig is told: You are guilty, but because you are a prominent man and the newspapers have made a great hubbub, we are afraid to let you go to jail. Mr. Craig could be spared from his office as readily as Mayor Hylan has been, nor would his family be left in want as in the case of many a poor devil of a John Doe. The recommendation of the Department of Justice in the Craig case is in striking contrast to its pusillanimous poltroonery in regard to political prisoners, where there has been no such club of moneyed and powerful opinion brandished in its face. The one cheerful aspect is the promise of Representative La Guardia and others to carry the issue into Congress. Mr. La Guardia proposes that conviction for contempt, when based on any act outside the courtroom, shall be possible only through trial by jury. We would go further and abolish the institution of contempt of court, except where there is a refusal to carry out, or an attempt to obstruct, a judicial order. The crime of lese majeste should have no place in a democracy. A judge is entitled to no protection from criticism which is not provided in existing laws against libel, slander, and disorderly conduct.

SOMEBODY might remind "our Mr. Weeks," who presides over the War Department, that the cost of a bull in a china shop is not primarily the board and lodging of the bull but the crockery he smashes. Thus the Secretary of War's economical soul rejoices in announcing that the upkeep of our army, navy, and marine corps absorbed only 14 per cent of the federal budget for the last fiscal year. Delighted! But how about the smashed crockery? How about the debt for past wars, the upkeep of the Veterans' Bureau, and the expenditure for pensions (not to speak of a bonus in the offing)? Mr. Weeks does not give us the total percentage for warfare past and present. For the year 1920 government statisticians computed the total as 93 per cent! Owing to reduced annual expenditures, it has fallen a little since, but it is still too staggering for Mr. Weeks to care to compute it. Incidentally, the War Department is still getting rid of material which apparently is a hold-over from its riotous purchases during the World War. A correspondent sends us a catalogue of a sale in which appear 4,220 cans of allspice provided by some thoughtful commissary; also 549,880 currycombs. "Were there that many horses and mules in the army," he wonders, "or did the men use them for back-scratchers?"

FORECASTERS have been prophesying that the Conservatives would come through the British election for a second time with a minority of the votes cast but with a safe majority in Parliament. Lloyd George predicted a million majority for free trade—but, under the electoral system which prevails in England as here, the protectionists may nevertheless tip the scales in Parliament. At the last election the Conservatives cast only 39 per cent of the votes, but they won 54 per cent of the seats. Labor, with 30 per cent of the votes, got only 25 per cent of the seats, and the two wings of the Liberals, with almost as many votes as Labor, together had only 19 per cent of the seats. In the last Canadian election the Conservatives polled 962,601 votes and won 50 seats; the Progressives polled only 726,730 votes, but won 65 seats. Whenever there are three parties to a contest the system creaks and groans. In Queensland this year Labor won 43 seats to the Opposition's 29, although it polled fewer votes; the Opposition's forces were divided. The answer, of course, is proportional representation.

GERMANY'S troubles do not diminish, although a vigorous campaign against the food profiteers has led to some reductions in prices. Food still costs more in Germany, reckoned in dollars, than in the outside world, although wages and salaries are only a fraction of those elsewhere. Dr. Albert was unable to form a cabinet, and, as we write, it is uncertain whether his successor, Dr. Marx, will be able to hold the confidence of the Reichstag. Almost his first official act was to lengthen the working day of government clerks. Power, however, no longer lies with the Reichstag, or even with the civil government. The industrialists pull the strings, and General von Seeckt, commander of the Reichswehr, is threatening a dictatorial suppression of Vorwärts, official organ of the largest party in the Reichstag, because it refuses to tell him the source of its revelations about his organization. Meanwhile Poincaré and the Baldwin Government are holding desultory conversations regarding a limited inquiry into Germany's capacity to pay, and are endeavoring to induce the American Government to join their futile palavers.

HENRI BARBUSSE is honored by the fact that the Poincaré Government has indicted him for his speech at the Berlin Congress of the International Union of Ex-Service Men. These words constitute his "guilt":

> Two years ago, when there were diplomatic difficulties between Germany and France about what they call reparations (as if the war could be repaired), Karl Tied wrote me in the name of the German ex-service men that you had sworn that, if you were mobilized, you would turn your arms rather against your officers than against your French brothers. I read that letter to our national congress at Levallois; it made clear the importance and significance of our International Union. Those words come back to me today. I speak through you to the French soldiers of the army of occupation. I have no means of speaking directly to them, but I know that in one way or another the words I speak here will be repeated to them. When I return to France I shall print them, and I cry to those soldiers: If you are ordered to march against your German brothers, whose breasts and arms form the defense of the working-class, do not do it! Understand on which side of the struggle lie your interest and your destiny before you commit the crime of obeying your officers.

CARLO TRESCA'S conviction on November 27 for advertising an Italian book on birth control in his paper, Il Martello, seems to be the final step in an indecent and dishonest persecution of a man who is said by our State Department to be "causing friction between two governments" and who is hungrily awaited in Italy for his successful efforts to prevent Fascista organizations in this country. When the Post Office Department stated that the advertisement in question was not mailable it was deleted, and the issue was then accepted for mailing. Two other papers carrying the same advertisement have not been brought to the bar. The proprietor of an Italian bookstore in New York City which sells the book has not been molested, nor did the customs authorities make any attempt to hold up shipments of it. The book is not worrying the federal agents; it is the man Tresca who insists on attacking Fascism and thereby becomes a pestiferous fly in the cup of friendship between Mussolini's country and Harry Micajah Daugherty's.

ON June 17 the police refused to allow Tresca to speak in Buffalo. The July 21 issue of Il Martello was suspended from the mails without warning and no specific charges were brought; the case was finally dropped. On August 14 Tresca was arrested for what amounted to a crime of lese majeste, an article, then three months old, against the Italian monarchy. That indictment has not come to trial. On September 6, armed with a permit from the mayor, Tresca attempted to speak in New Kensington, Pennsylvania, but was prevented by the chief of police. On August 18 he was required to delete from his paper the announcement of a raffle, although two other papers carried the notice unchallenged. On October 27 he was compelled to make an entirely new run of the edition, omitting an account of an occasion when the Fascisti forced a woman to take castor oil. The issue of November 10 was held up because of a prophecy that Mussolini would come to the same end as Rienzi, although the issue of April 21 had quoted the same statement by Arthur Brisbane. The issue of November 24, containing the charge that Mussolini appropriated for his election expenses a sum intended for D'Annunzio in Fiume, has been declared "unmailable." And now, finally, the conviction of November 27. It took six months, but the long arm of Mussolini has finally reached him, here in the home of the free.

> ". . . that all who come to this shrine which we are dedicating to our dead may be forced to stop and think, and thinking, see for at least one moment the reality and the truth of war as known by our fallen comrades, and against which they fought and gave their lives."

THUS a member of the Frank B. Amaral Post, No. 113, of the American Legion explains the feeling of his group about the sort of memorial they wish erected to their dead. Appalled by the type of war memorial which only serves to create a feeling of romance and glorious adventure that is not in war, this post of the Legion has selected a bronze tablet on which Mrs. Anna Coleman Ladd has depicted the gaunt, rigid skeleton of a soldier helplessly caught in barbed-wire entanglements, symbolizing in his person the futility, the useless sacrifice, and the ghastliness of war stripped of its glamor. Post No. 113 expects a storm of protest which they say will mean this—"that the general public hates to face reality and does not except when so compelled to do," and that "in our memorial it has seen the truth and, seeing, rebels against the horror of war."

IT is a pleasure to turn from the atmosphere of intellectual fear and repression in some of our universities to the freer air of the New Hampshire hills, where Dartmouth College is giving a fine example of faith in an education which conceives of the student mind not as a container to be filled with a given product but as an organism which can grow and function only as it has the opportunity to range facts and theories side by side. We are reminded by a communication from the Round Table, a student organization, that "any group within the college has perfect freedom to invite anyone they wish to speak here, and the administration gives the use of the college buildings for the address." Scott Nearing spoke last winter and William Z. Foster last month. Of the address by the latter we read in the college daily: "The crowd, which was probably hostile before the speaker began, was softened by Mr. Foster's first sentence, in which he stated that it was a privilege to speak at Dartmouth because it was one of the few prominent colleges that retained the right of free speech."

SOME plodding arithmetician has counted all the words in all the sentences of all the speeches of all the presidents of these United States. Coolidge, it seems, is the record-holder. He averages but eighteen words per sentence, where Lincoln averaged 26.6, Harding 28.9, Wilson 31.8, Taft 39.9, Roosevelt 41, and Washington—long-winded sinner that he must have been—51.5. Just what it proves we do not know, but doubtless the statistician felt a gratifying sense that he had concluded a unique and original research. It would be just like this cynical age for some young whippersnapper to arise and remark that the stenographers were responsible for the difference, and that if Washington had only been reported by a graduate of S. S. Sap's Stenographic School, which teaches a preference for periods in place of semi-colons, he would have outranked Calvin himself.

"COMRADE OLIVER" BALDWIN is the son of the Prime Minister of Great Britain. While his father is stumping Britain for the Conservative Party young Oliver is stumping Buckinghamshire for the Labor Party. His opinion of his father's Government is clear-cut:

> The Government has been in office twelve months and what have they done? They have done nothing save twiddle their fingers. Their foreign policy is terrible. The Government talks about protection. The only protection I want is protection against a Government like that.

He may need it when he gets back home—though we suspect that the Prime Minister, on trial for his political life, enjoyed his son's campaign against him as much as anyone else in Britain. It is as it should be. If Oliver Baldwin ever becomes a Labor minister, we hope that his son will take the stump for the Tories. There is no health in a family where successive generations think and vote according to an ancestral tradition.

THAT story of eleven-year-old Leo Granoff, the Boy Trotzky of Harlem, for instance, filled us with enthusiasm. Leo, it seems, found his empty home unbearable when his mother went to the theater; finally he was, as he put it, so scared that he went down to the street and, as the police would say, "loitered" near the corner drugstore. He loitered so disconsolately that a policeman became interested. The next thing Leo knew he was being searched, and in his pockets, among the normal contents of an eleven-year-old boy's pockets, the policeman found Communist tracts. Horrors! Leo was arrested; a sharp detective discovered that Leo was secretary, or third vice-president, or something, of the Harlem Branch of the Young Workers' League. Leo was photographed, and interviewed, and finally released. The next day Miss Etta Leighton, a white-collar slave, as Leo would say, who works for the National Security League, sallied forth to study the horrid phenomenon. She found Leo gaily roller-skating with a new brand of literature in his pockets—copies of the newspapers containing his picture and an interview in which Leo declared that he preferred life in America to life in Russia because he felt his message more needed here. The white-collar slave also interviewed Leo, and forthwith gave out a statement to the papers in which she exclaimed: "It's no joke; it's a tragedy," and expressed her fears for the foundations of the republic. The republic will stand; as Heywood Broun remarked, Leo is as likely as not to grow up into a standpat Republican.

ONE of the undeniable virtues of President Roosevelt was his fearlessness in taking a stand on public questions, no matter how ticklish. In regard to the Ku Klux Klan, at least, his eldest son has inherited his father's directness. A K. K. K. speaker at Freeport, Long Island, was recently reported to have extended the organization's support to "Young Teddy," whereupon the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People sent a telegram of inquiry to the Assistant Secretary of the Navy. "I have not heard one thing about the Ku Klux Klan indorsing me," wrote Mr. Roosevelt in reply. "I cannot conceive that it is so, because I came out flatfooted against them in a public speech at the National Republican Club on Lincoln's Birthday last year." This is good Americanism, and in the long run it will prove to be good politics. We do not need laws or rival organizations to fight the Klan; we do need to know the attitude of every candidate for public office toward the purpose of the K. K. K. to limit liberty, equality, and fraternity to those who are white, Gentile, and Protestant.

MISS "BILLY" TICHENOR is white, Gentile, and Protestant, so she is not hounded by the Ku Klux Klan. Yet in this land of liberty-with-a-string-to-it she, too, has her troubles, as one gathers from her letter to the Board of Bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church, recently in session in New York City, whom she feelingly addressed as "Revered Leaders":

> I am a member of the Methodist Church South, and so are my parents. So were my parental grandparents and great-grandparents. You Northern Methodists are forbidden to dance, play cards, and go to the theater or circus under penalty of expulsion. Both Northern and Southern branches, separated before the Civil War by the slavery question, are probably soon to reunite. Would the amusement ban later apply also to us Southern Methodists? My vocation is now that of an exhibition dancer. Bishop Berry has said actors are not welcome as Methodists. Must Methodists who go on the stage give up the church membership which means so much to them? Would I be required to resign if the Southern group amalgamates with the Northern Methodists? Won't you please use your influence with annual conferences and the 1924 General Conference to get these blue laws lifted?

After giving this letter, we assume, their best consideration, the "revered leaders" replied:

> Concerning the various matters discussed in your letters, authority does not lie with the bishops of the church; and we feel, therefore, that answers to your questions are not within our province. But the bishops assure Miss Tichenor of their good wishes, and pray God that she and her parents may have the divine blessing.

It is nice of the "revered leaders" to extend to Miss "Billy" the hope of "divine blessing"—even if she has to seek it on the back stoop instead of inside the church.

"THE MARCONI OF TELEPATHY," as a Swiss named Konradi Leitner calls himself, disappointed several hundred persons in a New York theater because he failed to hypnotize the entire audience at once as he had promised. An instructor in psychology at Columbia University is conducting serious experiments to discover whether two trained subjects, working half a mile or more apart, can select the same picture from duplicate sets at the same time. St. Mark's Church in New York City announces as a feature of its annual festival of St. Nicholas "an explanation of the occult world by a committee under the guidance of Mrs. Samuel Untermyer." Probably Mrs. Untermyer and her committee can explain the occult world at least as well as anybody else. Naturally they would not attempt to explain the visible world or the actions of human beings, of which at present we have only the vaguest understanding. No theaters are crowded to find out why humans put each other in jail and kill each other and run for Congress and send Christmas cards. Some problems are too hard for experts in psychology.

Film Censors and Other Morons

A MAGNIFICENT farce could be written on the works and ways of the film censors in the various States, but their antics are important because they illustrate what an irresponsible and dangerous thing censorship is.

Let us give a few examples. In 1921 the Kansas State Board of Review ordered all scenes and titles dealing with the Tulsa, Oklahoma, race riots eliminated. Newspapers were printing pictures and stories about the riots every day, but the newspapers have waged a long and successful fight against censorship in peace time at least. The movies, afraid of their dollars, have yielded abject surrender, and the result is a fraud upon the public. Even Ku Klux Klan pictures were barred by the Kansas board, and other boards, too, have yielded to its dark influence. The Ohio board once ordered cut these words: "Probe of murders laid to Klan."

Accounts of the tricks of these censors read like a burlesque of the worst possibilities of censorship. One board ordered out the title, "Harvey Porter, an attorney to whom victory is more important than the honor of his profession," in its zealous respect for lawyers. Another board objected to the title "Kick the dog and Brulet will fight"—in "The Oregon Trail"—as "tending to incite to crime." Still another objected to a picture of a marriage by radio as "sacrilegious," although such a marriage had in fact been performed. From a Rupert Hughes comedy the title "In Sicily they challenge to a duel by biting off the tip of your ear" had to go. It was the Ohio board which would not let the International News Service say of Eugene V. Debs: "Leaving the White House after telling President Harding he has not changed his mind." In Illinois a picture was barred because a delegation of ministers who had never seen it protested that they had heard that it reflected upon the clergy. Texas barred a fantasy based on Aladdin's Lamp as "medieval, fantastic, absurd, and fit only for the dark ages." Pennsylvania would not even permit the word "anarchists" in a film, suggesting "fanatics" as an alternative, although the "anarchists" were pictured as wreckers of society. Ohio would not allow a parrot in an O. Henry story to say "Give him hell, Dickey," and here in New York filmgoers were not permitted to see these horrid words (in a scene showing the spanking of two children by their uncle): "This hurts me more than it does you!" "Yes, but not in the same place."

It sounds crazy. The movies sometimes try to defend themselves, but they are not permitted even to do that. A Pathé news reel pictured several sponsors of the censorship, with the caption: "The people who favor censorship of moving pictures will oftentimes argue the hardest in favor of letting the people rule," but Ohio ordered the caption out. We are subjected in the movies to irresponsible boards of morons, who cut anything which offends their individual prejudices. No wonder the potentialities of the film are slow in developing.

We can expect such censorship on every printed word if the New York Legislature passes the "Clean Books Bill." And now the busybodies are begging permission to extend their puerilities to the spoken stage. They cry that the country is in danger from licentious plays and theatrical performances. In New York City the hue and cry is at its height. Commissioner of Licenses August W. Glatzmayer tells us that the self-constituted moral jury of authors, actors, managers, and plain citizens which was instituted last season has been scrapped—that, indeed, no complaints have been received; but Acting Mayor Murray Hulbert is on the warpath. He wants every theatergoer to complain whenever his or her moral sensibilities have been wounded. He hopes thus, he says, to defeat the nefarious plans of those who "wallow in dirt that they might wallow in riches."

Who, we wonder, does he mean by "they"? The musical shows display a little more epidermis than of yore, but we are not sure that this is not as decent as the old fashion of lingerie at provocative intervals. We suspect that Mayor Hulbert has his eye not on the musical shows, however, nor on the plays which picture life with an indecent falseness, but on those which are really most moral in their piercing of conventional hypocrisies. He denounces plays which "make a laughing-stock of virtue and place vice on a pedestal." What does he mean? Does he mean virtue and vice according to the statute-books, or according to the churches that forbid dancing and call belief in evolution a crime, or according to the dictates of a delicate and enlightened conscience? We suspect that he objects to plays like "Rain" rather than to shows like "Artists and Models." He lets the cat out of the bag when he denounces any play that "contains words or expressions doing violence to accepted standards." Like all censors he wants life petrified.

And it is just such a censorship that the "unco guid" and the pathologically angry sigh for. For to the arm of the state is about to be added that of the church. Bishop Manning vociferously brandishes the moral tomahawk. The Social Service Commission of his diocese, besieged with complaints, is about to start an investigation. According to these complaints the conditions of the New York stage are "terrible." The reverend bishop refuses so far to name plays. He insinuates that they are in fact nameless. Equally aroused are the New York Federation of Churches and the Society for the Prevention of Crime. The redoubtable Sumner, strange to say, seems to be in a mild and placable mood. But the probable results of ecclesiastical "censure" can be studied from one priceless example. The Rev. Dr. S. Edward Young, president of the Society for the Prevention of Crime, and Mrs. Young visited in the course of their research the Knickerbocker Theater, saw "The Lullaby," and "found no fault with it." Now we do not wish to see "The Lullaby" suppressed. We would fight such suppression tooth and nail because we believe that the hurt done the cause of liberty and tolerance infinitely outweighs the shocked susceptibilities of voluntary visitors to a place of public amusement. But if there is one play in New York today that is morally false and misleading to the repulsive core of it, one play that is rancid in substance and meretricious in execution, that play is "The Lullaby." But because it could be summed up in a copybook maxim the Rev. Dr. Young finds no fault with it. What he, alas, is after is not hypocrisy and meretriciousness but fresh notions of human life and an attitude of inquiry.

New York is fast becoming the first theatrical city in the world. It can manage Mr. Hulbert; let it beware of Dr. Manning and his cohorts—else they will reduce its great stage to the level of Hollywood.

A Trial by Fire

NOT in a long time have we heard anything which has thrilled us more than the accounts of the recent fire at Rosemary School at Greenwich, Connecticut. Here were about fifty young girls who were suddenly awakened at half-past three to find their dormitory full of blinding smoke. Three minutes after the alarm sounded all the lights went out. There was only the house-mistress to represent the school authority and she was not a part of the fire drill. Yet, under the most trying circumstances, that system worked perfectly. The fire captain we should call a true heroine were that term not so shockingly misused and overworked. She kept her head perfectly and so did all her lieutenants. Every one of the girls carried out the part assigned to her without hesitation and every one got out safely, albeit several had narrow escapes. When all were out these young women, keeping strictly to the rule of absolute silence imposed during all fire drills, lined up on the terrace with the flames shooting out above their heads, while the roll was called. Then, rejoicing that all were saved, they marched, still in absolute silence, to another building. The sound of their feet upon the stone walk was the first word that came to the occupants of other buildings that their fellow-pupils were safe. Not one fainted; not one became hysterical. The whole constitutes a wonderful triumph of courage and discipline, for, had any one of those young women in authority faltered, a tragedy must have been inevitable.

To understand the full significance of all this, the reader must know that this fire drill was originally worked out by a student only a couple of years ago, and that all the training in it, and each annual readjustment, is done by the students themselves. It prescribed among other things that each girl should always have her overcoat and overshoes on a chair by her bedside, and should stop for no other article of attire, a regulation which undoubtedly saved lives when the test came. Rosemary is entirely under student self-control. The discipline which came through so perfectly was installed and instilled by the girls themselves, who, if we are correctly informed, enforce the penalties for misdemeanors and non-observance. Is it any wonder that one's pulses beat a bit faster when one learns this story and pictures those young women who had just barely saved their lives calmly standing in line under the flames while their names were called? Or that one turns exultantly from the incidents of it to confront those who constantly bewail the decadence of our time, the hopeless license of the oncoming generation, who believe that the freedom of modern times makes for the undermining of the character of our youth?

Thank heaven we are forever rid of the super-sensitive, ever-fainting young female of Jane Austen's day who proceeded to lose her senses whenever her emotions were played upon unduly. What becomes, too, in the light of a story like this of all the silly nonsense about the "superior sex" and its monopoly of all the so-called manly virtues? Could any boys' school surpass this record of self-control under the most trying of circumstances? We think not, for it is a simple fact that nobody could have behaved better, or shown steadier nerves. Yet we suppose we shall still have to hear much about the modern flapper and all her faults, and how this "new freedom" of 1923, with the ballot box in the background, is depriving our young women of all the finer qualities of womanhood. Well, there may be finer qualities than were displayed at Rosemary, but they are not numerous. Nor do we know a better system of human government than self-government. That it cannot be applied too early in life has long been our belief. The record of Rosemary proves its correctness anew.

"No Policy of Aggression"

THERE is no reason to quarrel with the main principles set forth by Charles E. Hughes, our Secretary of State, in his reaffirmation of the Monroe Doctrine before the American Academy of Political and Social Science on November 30. There was no blatant assertion of super-sovereignty, as in his speech last summer before the American Bar Association. We disagree, to be sure, with his remarks on property rights and the obligations that they impose:

> A confiscatory policy strikes not only at the interests of particular individuals but at the foundations of international intercourse, for it is only on the basis of the security of property validly possessed under the laws existing at the time of its acquisition, that the conduct of activities in helpful cooperation is possible. Each state may have its code of laws in accordance with its conception of domestic policy, but rights acquired under its laws by citizens of another state it is under an international obligation appropriately to recognize.

This is a doctrine which in recent years strong nations have assiduously tried to force upon weaker ones, but it is not consistent with national sovereignty. What is or is not confiscation is a matter of opinion, and in any event every state has a right, as we have repeatedly asserted, to manage its fiscal and industrial affairs as it pleases. The most that any other nation is morally justified in demanding is that its citizens shall receive the same treatment under the law as all others.

But the vital defect in Mr. Hughes's words is that they do not square at all with the facts of American policy in Central or South America for the last quarter of a century. "We have no policy of aggression," declared Mr. Hughes. No? Then why such a persistent practice of it? Why Roosevelt's seizure of the isthmus of Panama; why the presence, while Mr. Hughes was talking, of United States marines in the supposedly independent republics of Nicaragua, Haiti, and Santo Domingo? As Ernest Gruening pointed out in an article on the Monroe Doctrine in The Nation last week, the United States has broken sharply with the original theory of the Monroe Doctrine ever since the Spanish-American War. In spite of our absurd pretensions in regard to Pan-Americanism, there is not a country to the south that trusts us; there is not one that desires our protection against European aggression; there is not one that would not welcome a declaration by some other Power against our further encroachments; there is not one that does not know that Mr. Hughes's words are ridiculously at variance with all the facts.

The financiers, not Mr. Hughes, are actually directing our policy. By playing to the cupidity of small groups in one Latin American republic after another, they are making loans or investments under favored conditions and then calling upon a government at Washington—complacent and hypocritical—to uphold their "rights." And yet Mr. Hughes gravely asserts: "We have no policy of aggression."

The Next War Draws Near

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

London, November 16

"IF the Germans cut loose, our three divisions in the Ruhr are lost." Thus spoke a prominent French general in the Ruhr the other day to an Allied general, a former comrade in arms. By that remark the French general merely emphasized what is quite apparent to military observers—that the position of the French troops in the Ruhr is an extremely serious one if the Germans should finally be goaded into resorting to such arms as they have. The Westphalians are not like the inhabitants of the Palatinate and the Rhineland, who are in many respects the most easygoing and peacefully disposed of the Germans. The Westphalian is a rough, hard-working and hard-fighting being who has been for generations engaged in the most difficult of physical occupations. He has been extraordinarily patient and long-suffering under the harsh and brutal measures of the French; he held himself in check when, as he thinks, his comrades in the Krupp works were wantonly murdered by a frightened lieutenant and his file of men. But what worries foreign observers, and the French as well, is whether the day will not come when the Ruhr worker, seeing his wife and children dying of starvation before his eyes, will prefer to go against the French guns rather than endure such torture any longer.

This is no idle fear. It is not so very long ago that the leaders of the workingmen in a certain Ruhr town (there are very good reasons for withholding its name) went to the foremost industrialist and said to him: "Do you want these Frenchmen out of here? If so we'll throw them out by tomorrow morning. They are five thousand and we are fifty thousand." Naturally the industrialist was horrified. "Are you mad?" he asked. "Don't you realize that if you kill these French others will come here from Essen and Düsseldorf and destroy our city and everything in it?" He was able to dissuade them, and so have others elsewhere to whom the same suggestion has been made. But the question still remains whether these checks can be applied indefinitely; whether the hour will not come when there will be a resort to arms even if it means the end of everything. A year and a half ago two prominent German pacifists told me that if the French troops were not withdrawn from the Rhineland their countrymen would attack the invaders within five years with bare fists if they had no weapons. That was six months before the occupation of the Ruhr, whose horrors and vindictive cruelties they had not foreseen, nor the now impending starvation in the Ruhr.

The French are not blind to the danger. They show it in their obvious nervousness and the great displays of force they are constantly making. The French generals are plainly ill at ease when, as in Essen the other day, they ride through great crowds of ominously quiet and starving people. Especially do they show it in the cities like Mayence, where they have concentrated thousands of their women and children. They have compelled Mayence to build an entirely new quarter composed of magnificent apartment houses, each apartment in which has to be fitted up for the conquerors down to the last towel, the last piece of china, kitchen-ware, and bed-linen. In another section they have made the city build for them huge barracks, which is the clearest proof that they have no intention of ever vacating Mayence unless they are compelled to go. Now, on the night of the trial of young Thyssen when the verdict of guilty was pronounced by the French court-martial, there was an outpouring of the population of Mayence such as was not equaled in the enthusiasm of the first days of war. The French were powerless to control the crowd and wisely did not attempt to. The people vented their indignation at this travesty of justice by surging through the city for hours, singing patriotic songs. Had they been inflamed by incendiary speeches there would not have been a Frenchman alive the next morning, and every French apartment would have been ransacked as well. (This is not my opinion only but that of other judges.) If the reader of this article has followed the Separatist developments in the Rhineland, he must have been struck by the mildness of the manifestations in Mayence; this mildness is to be considered in connection with those huge apartment houses and the fact that 95 per cent of all the hotel rooms there have been commandeered by the French for the use of their officers and officials and the wives, children, aunts, and cousins these have brought with them. What would not a sudden uprising, even if quickly put down, mean to these non-combatants whose lives M. Poincaré is jeopardizing?

To return to the general situation, all the old military textbooks used to lay down the law that the last thing an army ought to do is to fight with a deep river at its back. Should hostilities begin again General Degoutte's troops would not be in quite the same fatal position as General Burnside's Army of the Potomac at Fredericksburg; he was able to withdraw his defeated army to the north bank only because General Lee failed to appreciate how easily he could drive the enemy into the water. The French in Essen are some distance from the Rhine, and there are nearly 200,000 other French troops across the river. But they are dependent for their supplies upon an intricate system of railways, which could be cut with the greatest ease by desperate men; to protect them, Allied military men tell me, it would be necessary to guard every culvert and every bridge. A prominent American diplomat declares that he has for months past awakened every morning wondering whether the Rhine bridges had not been blown up in the night. He has been prophesying for months past that there would be hostilities between November and April. If you ask him and the British officers I have talked with how in the world an unarmed and starving population can fight against an army perfectly equipped with tanks, endless machine-guns, and poison gas, they reply that desperate men will stop at nothing and that it will not do to think of the coming war in terms of the old. They agree, of course, that the Germans could not arm and equip and supply an army of the old type. If war comes, they say, it will take the form of a guerrilla warfare after the Irish model, with flying columns of about 250 men and one cannon, and much bombing from the air. The head of an important British military school has been quoted to me as saying that those are precisely the tactics for the Germans to adopt.

That these details are being discussed in cold blood; that British officers smile at the question, How soon will you be fighting on the side of the Germans? and show no signs of resenting it, is one of the most alarming portents of the times in Europe. For another war would settle nothing and could only add to the utter misery and destruction. If it comes, it means that those bloodthirsty Englishmen and Americans who regretted that the war ceased before the German Rhineland cities were laid waste will have their wish gratified. And if by any chance the Germans should win, there would be devastation in France such as has not been witnessed heretofore. Hate begets hate, oppression oppression, bitterness bitterness, revenge revenge. Whereas there was no hatred of France in Germany in 1919—as I can testify from my observations at that time, and I can bring hundreds of other witnesses, of every nationality, to confirm it—but only respect for the magnificent way the French had fought for their country, today all Germany seethes with hostility and the determination to conquer them some day or be wiped out. That this is the case is the completest proof of the folly of the French since the surrender, as it is proof that if they really want security they have gone about it just the wrong way. When I asked the French official at Düsseldorf whose duty it was to answer the questions of the foreign correspondents whether it was not regrettable that there should be such a growth of hostility to the French among the Germans he answered: "As to that we don't care at all."

But the soldiers do. They are taking note of it because it has a distinct bearing upon the next catastrophe and because they believe that if it comes to another struggle those who hate hardest and are most bitter will win, whatever the disparity in armaments. The Englishmen say that as long as they hold the Cologne bridgehead it will be almost impossible for the French to start off for Berlin from the Ruhr, and they think that it would take a long time and an enormous number of men to get to the German capital. Of course the deeper the French penetrate into Germany the more men they will need to guard their communications and the easier it will be to cut those lines. The English point out, too, that if the French should decide to extend their "sanctions" to the occupying of Berlin, they would immediately have to recall to the colors a large number of men, to demand so large a mobilization that there would be a revolt among the French people. Certainly the political Left would make a tremendous protest, and the Communist movement in France is growing much faster than people outside of that country realize—their daily paper in Paris has now a circulation of over 200,000. If Poincaré has to mobilize even a fraction of the reserves, some of the deluded French people will realize that the policy of vindictive brute force has failed. Where would the franc drop to then? Again, if the French should ever retreat from Germany, it would be like the retreat from Lexington and Concord—there would be a foe behind every wall and tree.

Could England keep out of a new conflict between Germany and France? Who can say? Her troops are in a most difficult position now in the Cologne area. They are surrounded by French and Belgians with whose policies they do not sympathize; whose policies are responsible for the rapidly increasing unemployment in the British zone which is giving the British officials such deep concern. One of the highest British officials in Cologne is not in the least hesitant as to where he stands: "My sympathies are with the extreme German nationalists." "I spits when I sees a Frenchman," said a British corporal who was just leaving Cologne after a long service abroad, including four years on the French front during the war. His regiment is, like himself, on the side of the Germans. What is more important is that Great Britain's trade interests all incline her to antagonism to the French. There are those who believe that a serious situation will arise in London if, as is threatened, the next French "sanctions" should mean a seizure of Hamburg. Then the lion would roar even if his mouthpiece is so weak a statesman as Baldwin, for that would have a direct bearing upon the question of unemployment in England, which is Baldwin's excuse for seeking a general election at this time. The Admiralty is being urged now to dispatch some cruisers to Hamburg so as to get ahead of a French move. It, if my information is correct, has its plans worked out as to what it will do if war with France comes. Its chief function will be to blockade the French ports, but not to occupy them, which will immediately raise the interesting military question whether ships can blockade harbors nowadays when the bombing air-machine has made such tremendous strides since the war as an offensive weapon.

A visiting European crowned head remarked in London the other day: "Everywhere I go these English tell me they don't dare to do this or that." But not all the English are afraid of France's power, for at about the same time a distinguished British soldier was declaring that the air defenses of London could be reestablished in forty-eight hours. "If we have to fight the French we shall dispose of them in five months with the aid of the Germans we shall arm," was his viewpoint. "If we had five shiploads of English airplanes we could begin to fight the French now," said a former German division commander in Berlin just four weeks ago; as it is we shall have to wait until after Christmas." I do not believe the stories that large numbers of men are being trained in Germany. Why should they be? Germany still has millions of war-trained soldiers—all she could possibly handle. There is no doubt, however, that there are groups of ex-officers meeting and planning for the next war and that cannot be stopped by any amount of Allied military control. The danger does not lie there but in the assumption of the government by men like Von Seeckt and Hindenburg, or the rising of the desperate people on the Rhine. I take no stock in the fixing of a nearby time to strike.

That was largely bluff, in my judgment. With Germany in its present chaos it is ridiculous to fix a time for anything. But I know and believe with all earnestness that what Poincaré is doing is bringing on the next war in Europe with giant strides, and that that war is inevitable unless the moral forces of the world are marshaled to stop what is happening in the occupied territories and to get the French out of all of Germany at once. It is for England and America to see that this catastrophe does not come to pass. They can stop it if they will. They will certainly be utterly lacking in true friendship and good-will to France if they do not unite to save her from the grave she is digging not only for herself but for all Europe. It is what A. G. Gardiner calls it in the London Nation, "the greatest crime in the history of Europe."

"Reversing" Burleson's Labor Policy

By STERLING DENHARD SPERO

TWO years ago last March Will Hays began to "humanize" the postal service with an honest attempt to right many Burleson injustices. Men who had been dismissed for organization activity were reinstated. Employee organizations were officially recognized. Burleson's policies were to be "completely reversed."

As a guaranty of the permanence and continuity of his new labor policy Mr. Hays established a "welfare division" under a "welfare director," to have oversight of all matters affecting the well-being of the personnel. A National Welfare Council, since rechristened National Service Relations Council, at the employees' request, was organized consisting of two representatives from each national postal organization with the service relations director as chairman. Local service councils were formed at hundreds of first- and second-class post offices, while county councils were established to meet the needs of rural carriers and third- and fourth-class post offices. These councils are purely advisory, although "all matters affecting working conditions of employees or relations between employees, officials, and the public" are declared "legitimate subjects" for "discussion and consideration."

Mr. Hays's first announcement of his welfare policy was greeted with no little suspicion by some of the workers' organizations. They were afraid that the councils were an attempt to backfire them; that the Administration, having seen the failure of other regimes to kill them by force, was trying to kill them by kindness. However, two factors have stood in the way of the use of the councils as clubs against the postal unions. First, the national organizations are the basis of representation on the National Council, and although the local unions or branches are not the unit of representation on local councils, they have, for the most part, succeeded in controlling the election of delegates to those bodies. Second, the councils are not a substitute for the direct dealing of organization officers with the authorities. The "reversal" of Burleson's labor policy gave these officers free access to headquarters.

The National Council meets regularly. It has dealt with a wide variety of questions, ranging from matters of routine and detail to subjects of vital administrative importance. Both the national and the local bodies have dealt with matters affecting the physical surroundings of the workers and have succeeded in having many minor causes of complaint adjusted. However, they have been unable to obtain results where the necessary reform involved the expenditure of money. In such cases the necessity for congressional action made it impossible for the Department to give relief. Many of the improvements with which the councils are credited are really the result of years of agitation on the part of the workers. For instance, their most widely heralded physical improvement, the installation of rest bars for distributors, is something for which the organized clerks had been agitating for at least ten years. Thus far the National Council has taken no position in conflict with the Department. Of the eleven organizations which it represents four represent the supervisory staffs and postmasters, and, as one would expect, cast their votes on the official side. Three others, though representing the rank and file, can usually be depended upon to take no stand likely to bring them into disfavor with the authorities.

When Mr. Hays left the Post Office Department for the movies, his successor, Hubert Work, made his contribution to "humanization" by inaugurating conference-conventions. Mr. Work characterized this innovation as "probably the greatest single accomplishment of the Department" during the first eighteen months of the Harding Administration. These conference-conventions meet once a year in a centrally located city in each State. They are composed of postal employees in the State, the officials, representatives of the Department, and large "users of mail." Employee organizations have no official place in these gatherings. From the point of view of attendance and enthusiasm the conference-conventions have been a great success. It remains to be seen whether they will develop into really useful institutions for the discussion of postal problems, or whether they will be merely occasions for the departmental representatives to make political speeches and pat themselves on the back. Reports of several gatherings so far held unfortunately point in the latter direction.

Unquestionably the morale of the service has improved since March 4, 1921. But this improvement, which was far more noticeable during Mr. Hays's year in office than it has been since, must be credited to factors other than service-relations work and conference-conventions. Any relief from Burleson conditions would have been hailed with joy and could not have failed to have a good effect upon the spirit of the force. But Mr. Burleson's successors have had nothing to do with the factors which have perhaps been the principal causes of a better spirit. The Salary Reclassification Act of June 5, 1920, was wrung from Congress by the organized employees in the face of the old Administration's bitter opposition months before Mr. Harding's election. The Civil Service Retirement Act of May 22, 1920, was the second factor making for a better spirit.

Yet in spite of improvements there have been indications a plenty that "humanization," notwithstanding the labor policy of the Post Office Department, has remained essentially unchanged. Mr. Hays, despite the fact that he told several delegations of employees that he was not enthusiastic about postal organizations affiliating with the American Federation of Labor, kept his promise to "treat all alike." Subordinate officials, however, during his and his successor's regimes have shown no little hostility toward postal unionism.

In the summer of 1922 there was evidence of an official campaign, in the Department's traditional style, against the more independent and progressive employee organizations, especially against the National Federation of Post Office Clerks, the pioneer postal union and the most advanced of all postal associations. Toward the end of June the First Assistant Postmaster General, Mr. Bartlett, established an official censorship over the bulletin boards in the workers' "swing," i.e., rest rooms. Prior to the order the employees had been accustomed to display such matter as they chose upon "swing room" boards.

It is significant that the bulletin-board order came but a few weeks after the National Federation of Post Office

Clerks had protested to President Harding against alleged violations of the eight-hour law by the postal authorities. When the President upheld the union, the latter in triumph issued a pamphlet containing the full correspondence of the controversy. Mr. Bartlett took indignant exception to this pamphlet, especially to the cover "flash" which read: "Chronological Record of Federation's Fight for Proper Observance of Postal Protective Law." He issued a message "to all post-office clerks," bitterly attacking the federation. Officialdom made every effort to have this message reach all who were supposed to read it. In New York and elsewhere clerks were compelled to sign for copies of the official Postal Bulletin which carried it. It is interesting that a few months ago Mr. Bartlett actually told a committee of Congress that the Department had been "compelled" to violate the eight-hour law the previous summer, and thus indirectly admitted the truth of the federation's contentions.

The attack on the federation reached its height at Minneapolis where the president of the clerk's local union, George N. Meyers, who was also president of the city Trades and Labor Assembly, was dismissed from the service because the latter body had passed a resolution condemning President Harding's stand on the railway-shopmen's strike. In response to insistent protests from many quarters, Postmaster General Work sent two inspectors to investigate the case. The investigation bore all the earmarks of an attempt to justify the Administration and disrupt the clerks' union. Meyers's dismissal was treated as a matter of secondary concern. The investigation closed with the discharge of the president, Meyers's successor, and the secretary of the local for technical violations of the postal regulations.

Another employee organization, the Railway Mail Association, has constantly complained that the Department was engaged in a systematic effort to "discredit" it, because of its opposition to the continuation of Burleson's policy of service curtailment for economy's sake. When the association established a system of local service committees to deal with the field officials, it found hostility so great in many centers as to render its efforts toward cooperation impossible.

Nationally, however, the situation seemed more hopeful at the beginning of Mr. Hays's term. The officers and national executive committee of the Railway Mail Association met in joint conference with the officials of the railway-mail service and drew up a series of "agreements" on a number of issues agitating the service. The assistant postmaster general in charge had previously given his assurance that "such agreements as may be reached will be carried out faithfully by the Department." Yet, hardly had the agreements gone into effect when the authorities began to interpret them in such ways as to nullify some of them almost entirely. This was notably true of the "overtime" agreement. The nullifying interpretations brought protests from the convention of the Railway Mail Association. To these protests the same assistant postmater general who had given the assurance just quoted retorted " . . . it is rather disconcerting to find that you feel that the provisions . . . of our agreement are mandatory and that you are disposed to exact literal application of them regardless of the runs affected."

Meanwhile the association's reactionary faction was doing its best to swing the organization back to its old policy of maintaining an official "stand in" and doing nothing to "embarrass" the Administration. It finally succeeded in forcing a referendum to reconsider the question of affiliation with the American Federation of Labor. But when the vote was taken last fall the progressives carried the day, ordering the retention of membership in the American Federation of Labor by a two to one vote.

"Humanization" has failed to shake the bureaucracy from its control of the service. The truth is that the individual employees—city carriers, rural carriers, clerks, and railway-mail clerks—are being driven harder today than ever before. In proportion to the volume of mail the working force is smaller than at any time within the quarter century. Nevertheless "humanization" has had its value in that it has taught the workers that the best intentions of the political heads of the Department are no substitute for strong and independent employee organization.

Is Pan-Americanism a Joke—On Us

By A PAN-AMERICAN JOURNALIST

I AM an Argentine. Not an Argentinian, as you North Americans say, incorrectly, but an Argentine. I have visited your country several times. I profess to know it as well as any intelligent foreigner who is not a permanent resident can know it. But I am not going to tell you what I think of it. Every foreigner does that. I am going to tell you what you think of my country. I am going to tell you that, although your Government and many of your public men have for years been fostering a creed called "Pan-Americanism," or "Pan-American solidarity," such a thing is still more of an idea than a fact.

Listen to my conversation with George Hopkins Smith, Esq., a New York lawyer, graduate of Yale; or maybe it is Bertram A. Jones, of Chicago, box manufacturer, graduate of the University of Michigan; or Lucas Robinson, editor of the Minneapolis Blade.

"How do you do, Mister—er Quintana? You are a South American, are you?" he remarks when I am introduced to him as recently arrived from Buenos Aires.

"Well," I reply, "I was born in Argentina."

"Yes, I had heard you were a South American. I've met quite a number of your countrymen lately, and they all spoke English so well, like yourself. I met one from Santiago. Then I met a most charming South American woman. She came from Montevideo, I think—wonderfully well dressed. I took her for an American. Really, you South Americans are comers. How are things in South America, anyway?"

"That's a pretty big question," I answer. "It's rather a big continent, you know. I can speak only for my own country."

"Yes, of course. I meant to say how are things in Brazil?"

"But I come from Buenos Aires."

"Oh yes, to be sure; Buenos Aires is the capital of Argentina and it's Rio that's the capital of Brazil. I remember now—Rio is where Hughes went to the exposition they had there to celebrate Brazil's declaration of independence from Spain a hundred years ago."

"From Spain?" I exclaim. "Pardon me for correcting you—from Portugal. Brazil was settled by the Portuguese, you remember. They speak Portuguese in Brazil."

"They do? You don't say? Yes, I remember now. I was thinking that all you South Americans spoke Spanish."

"No more than all you North Americans speak English," I remark.

"But we do all speak English, except, of course, in the foreign colonies in the big cities."

"Not in Mexico," I retort.

"Mexico? Mexicans aren't Americans" (astonished).

"Not citizens of the United States, but Mexico is in North America and so is Canada."

"But they are three different countries; quite different."

"To be sure, and so are all the countries in South America quite different. Had you ever thought of that?"

Thereupon I try to persuade George Hopkins Smith, Esq., to listen to a lecture, or possibly it is Mr. Jones, the manufacturer, or Editor Robinson—let it be any one of them. I have had such conversations with dozens of your fellow-countrymen, and occasionally one of them shows enough interest to hear me through. If so, I say to him:

"You North Americans—you Americans, as you exclusively call yourselves—lump the ten nations of South America into one. Argentina, Ecuador, Colombia, Uruguay, Chile, Venezuela, Peru, Paraguay, Brazil, Bolivia—they're all the same to you. Ethnologically, philologically, economically, and even politically you think of them as a unit. You do not grant them national individuality. I have talked with people in all parts of your country, including your government officials at Washington, educated men like yourself. Almost without exception they referred to me, as you have, as a 'South American.' They spoke of 'conditions in South America,' of products and information that came 'from South America'; seldom of any special country. It did not occur to them, as in your case, that they were talking to an Argentine, or that Argentina is as different from Venezuela, and Brazil as different from Chile, as the United States is from Australia.

"I am a South American, geographically," I continue, "just as Canadians and Mexicans, geographically, are North Americans, but I was born in, owe allegiance to, and fervently love a country called Argentina, la Republica Argentina. I have respect and what we call in Spanish confraternidad for the people of other South American countries, but I do not relish having my nationality obliterated by being classed without distinction with Brazilians, Venezuelans, Paraguayans, Peruvians, and Chileans. I know that they feel the same way about it.

"Once, when one of your Secretaries of State was visiting Uruguay while on a mission of friendship to several South American republics, a number of your journalists who accompanied him were tendered a banquet by the journalists of Montevideo. High Uruguayan government officials, the leading editors, and other important personages were present. There was much good oratory, in Spanish, dwelling on the same old 'bonds of friendship that unite the republics of Uruguay and the United States' of which the guests of honor did not understand a word. One of them, however, had to make a speech in reply, which he did in English while an interpreter translated it into Spanish, sentence by sentence. He, too, expatiated on the bonds of friendship, but not between Uruguay and the United States. No, his theme was the ties that bind the United States and South America. And in concluding he said 'Gentlemen, I lift my glass to South America.' 'Uruguay, you chump. Drink to Uruguay,' stage-whispered a resident and wiser North American correspondent who sat at his side. And the speaker lamely added to his sentence the name of the proud country in which he was being entertained.

" 'What did you make me do that for?' he asked afterward.

" 'For the same reason,' said the resident correspondent, 'that, had you been making a speech like this in Paris and had lifted your glass to Europe—you wouldn't have done it. Can you imagine what a hit a toast to Europe would make with the French these days? You know that it would be meaningless. It is just as meaningless here to drink a toast to South America.' "

"But we have only the friendliest feelings for you, Mr. Quintana," says my victim.

"Oh, we don't doubt that. We in Argentina accept your good intentions and good-will, but what irritates us is your profound ignorance of us, what we are and what we do. Knowing what a great nation you are, we wish your understanding and recognition of our individuality. We read emanations from the Pan-American Union headquarters in Washington eulogizing us, telling of our resources, our high civilization, and our bright future, but when I come to visit you and say I am from Buenos Aires, I am taken for a Brazilian or just a 'South American.' I wonder who reads this literature of the Pan-American Union, anyway.

"The most of you picture us as half-breed Indians squatting about the doors of adobe huts, weaving mats, pounding corn in a mortar, and fetching water from the river in clay jugs. You have seen pictures of the half-naked tribes on the Amazon, or the remnant of the Incas in the Andes, and that is your picture of all of us."

"Oh, I am sure you exaggerate, Mr. Quintana. I never quite thought that myself, and I am certain the majority of Americans know you are far beyond that stage."

"Perhaps I do exaggerate," I interrupt, "perhaps I do; but let me tell you what a New York newspaper published about the proprietor of an Argentine newspaper on his arrival in New York a few years ago. His paper is as successful and as internationally enterprising as that which sent a reporter to interview him. At the conclusion of the article the reporter wrote: 'The South American editor was dressed like any other gentleman.'

"The editor still keeps a clipping of this article as an amusing souvenir of his visit to the United States. 'I suppose,' he told me, 'that the reporter expected to find me dressed in a belt of palm leaves or, at the best, wearing a poncho.'

"I replied that I should have thought that a great New York newspaper would know better than to publish such a characterization.

" 'No,' laughed the Argentine editor, 'the reporter was a good reporter when he wrote that. It appealed to him and to the newspaper as news and, I found out, it was news to most of its readers that a person from anywhere in South America was dressed like any other gentleman.'

"Some time ago, your Secretary of State, Mr. Colby, visited Buenos Aires. He had received big popular demonstrations in Rio and in Montevideo, but when he stepped ashore at Buenos Aires the welcoming populace consisted of about fifty Americans, two Argentines who had been educated in the United States, and the longshoremen. No cheering people lined the streets as he drove to his hotel.

There was a quiet reception by Argentine government officials at the pier, an escort of grenadiers, but that was all. What was the trouble?

"Unfortunately it chanced to be New Year's Day, business was closed, and many people were away. Mr. Colby's loyal attachés were surprised and chagrined, I happen to know, at what they called a frosty reception, but one of the newspaper correspondents with him sensed the reason when he cabled to his paper: 'Secretary Colby made about as much impression upon arriving at Buenos Aires as the Argentine Foreign Minister would make on arriving in New York. It was not due to lack of respect for Mr. Colby or unfriendliness toward the nation he represented that he was not welcomed by 'cheering thousands.' It was that he was 'lost in the big city,' a city of nearly 1,800,000 inhabitants, accustomed to the visits, also, of distinguished Europeans."

"Your story is something of an eye-opener for me," say the lawyer, the manufacturer, the editor—almost all of them who have heard me through. The editor says that about the only thing that has ever made news from any of them is an earthquake or a revolution. The box manufacturer says he has such a good business at home that he does not need to export to South American countries and therefore has no special interest in them. The lawyer says he has always been interested in foreign affairs, but his outlook has been chiefly toward Europe. He always thought it a good idea for the Government to help the young South American republics along and keep the Monroe Doctrine going to protect them. He always supposed that "South Americans" liked the idea and that they were the people who were keen for Pan-Americanism. "Who started the Pan-American Union?" I asked him. "Hm--m, who did start it?" he reflects and recalls that it was the United States.

This lecture does not pretend to mean that we Argentines believe our country to be in every respect as progressive as yours. But we study you. You do not study us. We know your history. What you know of the histories of the respective South American republics can be summed up in three words—"series of revolutions." And what you know of them today seems little more than that they compose that vague geographical place, South America, that reminds you on the map of a top or a ham.

So I say, if you really want effective Pan-American cooperation, take some interest in us. It is hard for us to cooperate with people who are not interested in us. Teach your children the histories of the South American republics, give them books to study that will tell them what these republics are today. That will bring to the next generation the interest and the understanding that are necessary.

How Many Hirams?

(The Nation's Weekly Washington Letter)

By WILLIAM HARD

HAVING in the course of the last six years devoted many industrious, even if not laborious, hours to researches into the temperament of Hiram Johnson, and having often continued these researches to the point of the complete exhaustion and exasperation of the subject, I feel encouraged—and even qualified—to give an authoritative answer to the principal question which now seems to agitate the politically minded people of this country.

Is Hiram Johnson a "progressive"? Or is he a "conservative"?

Sometimes this problem is put more bitterly:

Has Hiram Johnson ceased to be a "progressive"? Has he become a "conservative"?

It is readily then to be seen that two deep difficulties are involved. First: What is progressivism? Second: Has Hiram Johnson changed?

The second difficulty is to me no difficulty at all. In spite of Hiram Johnson's offishness toward and from reporters, and in spite of his secluded determination to live in an antique colonial country-house in a grove some eight or nine miles out of Washington at the spur-end of a wretched road, I have pursued him and I have wrung his guilty secret from him.

This man Hiram Johnson is precisely the same man who came here six years ago.

He has not changed by an inch, an ounce, a jot, or a tittle. Whatever conservatism is in him now was in him then. Whatever progressivism was in him then is in him now. It is a political progressivism, a humanitarian progressivism, and not an economic progressivism.

Johnson thought—and thinks—that the electorate should be permitted (through such devices as direct primaries) to express its will freely and fully and directly in affairs of government and in affairs of party.

He thought—and thinks—that a railroad company (as, for instance, the Southern Pacific Railroad Company) should be a railroad and not a government.

He thought—and thinks—that wage-earners, when too weak to protect themselves, should be protected by law in the matter of the physical conditions of their employment.

It followed that he arrived in Washington trailing behind him a sort of comet's tail of supposed general complete comprehensive "progressivism." It was an optical illusion.

The intellectual fallacy which produced it can be stated very simply. It can be stated—I hope without offense—in the form of a homely and humble parable.

Once there was a man who liked apples. He liked them so much that he gained for himself a most tremendous national reputation as an apple-eater. Then, however, the fashion changed to pears. Now this man, as it happened, was no horticulturist and no pomologist. He had in his head no system of horticultural or pomological science. He knew nothing about any inward biological relationship between apples and pears. He would have been unable to perceive any reason why he himself, having found apples pleasant to his palate, should find pears equally pleasant. In any case it soon appeared that his appetite for pears was decidedly feeble. He just simply was no success as a pear-eater. Thereupon he sustained the following experience in cross-fire criticism.

Not only everybody who liked both pears and apples, but also everybody who hated both pears and apples, rose with the same unanimous motion from the table and shouted:

"You traitor! You welcher and quitter! You gorged yourself on apples and now instead of eating pears you actually eat oranges. You were in favor of throwing the Southern Pacific Railroad Company out of the politics of California. Now you have favored federal governmental aid to the American merchant marine! You voted to let the people of California have the initiative and referendum. Now you have voted to give them a high tariff on their lemons and almonds! You were for a minimum-wage law for women. Now you refuse to come out for a governmental corporation to buy the farmer's wheat! How dare you? As progressives, we denounce you. As conservatives, we denounce you. We have a philosophy. You may not see the connection between being for the referendum and having to be for a low tariff. We, however, do see it. Both propositions annoy the regulars. What is progressivism if not annoying the regulars? You, Hiram Johnson, made your start annoying the regulars; and, by the Eternal, you've got to keep on."

Such is the fate of Johnson, if certain persons of the grand right and of the grand left could have their way. Some such persons, of a character somewhat less arbitrary than in my fable, are indeed wiser, I think, than Johnson. They are wiser if they search indeed for a "progressivism" which will cover these latter-day economic questions as well as the old and easily heroic human political questions of the heyday of the initiative and the referendum and the recall and the direct primary and the oriflamme of Armageddon: "Let the people rule!"

In this issue it is true that Johnson is not a "progressive." It is also quite true that not Johnson—and not anybody else in political life in Washington, except Brookhart of Iowa—has even a suggestion for any really new economic order.

I do not call it "progressivism" simply to make suggestions for visiting upon our present economic order a plague of embarrassments and impediments.

Economic democracy means outright positive democratic cooperation in production and distribution and credit; or else it means not only nothing, but, through putting on the brakes without inventing any new steam, it means worse than nothing.

Johnson is politically a progressive. Politically he can see—and say—that the Southern Pacific has no right to rule California and that the United States Marine Corps has no right to rule Haiti and that the League of Nations has no right to rule the world.

In economics on the other hand Johnson belongs to no school. He sees no scheme that convinces him for any new economic order. He accordingly honestly accepts the present economic order. He honestly refrains from trying to sabotage it. He at the same time is frankly determined that heavy profits shall continue to carry heavy corresponding burdens. He is willing to see the top dog rise but he is not willing to see the under dog kicked. That is all. I would not call it economic "progressivism" or economic "conservatism." I would call it just present-day unphilosophical hard headed human hearted ordinary average puzzled economic Americanism.

O You Young Eagles!

By EDGAR LEE MASTERS

O you young eagles!
Fluttering out of nests in the mountains of vision,
Whose peaks stand calm as crystal
Amid vast azures of liberties;
You who opened eyes upon sky-girt seas of dawn,
And closed them amid the fraternal watchfulness of stars,
There in nests a century old,
O you young eagles,
Who seeing the sun-light of ascendant futures
Glistening the halcyon freshness of your feathers,
Beat your golden breasts with your wings—
Eagles of the Republic to be—
O you young eagles!

From the plains you come, and the valleys,
From the hills and the forested rivers,
From shores of the sea, and miles of meadow,
From summits of green, and levels of gold,
And slopes of purple where long winds blow;
From measureless stretches of corn,
Waving incalculable flags of green
To the marching of states and races;
From mountains where gusted storms
Eddy the snow, you come.
Flapping expectant wings, and calling,
And streaming across the heavens
To touch gray towers and halls of ivy,
Pausing to drink, to feed.
Then on! Storming the sky with wings,
And scattering from the assaulted sun
Sparks on the earth as you fly.
Eagles of the Republic to be—
O you young eagles!

The kites and crows fly you,
And hide from you,
And whistle and croak for you.
The barnyard fowls run cackling,
And call for shelters and laws!
Noisy and harmless barnyard fowls!
Give them the picketed yard and the coop,
The earth is yours beside, and the peaks,
And the kingdom of clouds—
O you young eagles!

Who will gather you under his wings
After you have left the nest?
Only the wings of the sun shall gather you,
After you leave your golden eggs in the nest
To be changed to wings
By the breast of a rising sun.

Rejoice, young eagles,
For the long flight ahead;
For the ecstasy of the battles
On your way to the sun!

In the Driftway

EDISON has been talking again about the coming of the four-hour working day—how we are progressing toward it with modern science and invention. Steinmetz, too, thought we were approaching it. In one of the last quoted utterances before his death he predicted that the working day of four hours was within seeing distance because of the vast development in labor-saving devices and methods.

THE Drifter regrets to dissent from this cheerful note. Despite his respect for the science of Edison and Steinmetz he thinks that their prophecy of the coming of the four-hour day on the wings of modern industrialism has about as much chance of becoming history as a peach crate of going through the Niagara whirlpool intact. The Drifter has a hunch—he will not dignify it as prophecy—that modern industrialism is not going to shorten the working day by a hair's breadth. In fact the Drifter goes further; he asserts that—contrary to popular belief—the working day is longer today than it was a hundred years ago. He is well aware that there is an array of statistics on the other side—that he is likely to be buried under an avalanche of official reports including all the latest inventions of the mathematicians. The trouble with these statistics is that—like most others—they are compiled by arithmeticians, not by philosophers. The working day must be judged not merely by the hours that one is on the job but by the energy it takes out of you; leisure is to be measured not by time only but by the strength which remains to utilize it. If, after six hours' labor, one is "all in" for the rest of the day, then his effective leisure is less than if, at the end of ten hours, he is still fresh. The Drifter holds that modern "speeding up" has more than destroyed the advantage of so-called shorter hours.

* * * * *

MODERN civilization has attacked leisure at another point. The worker, in many instances, has been so far removed from his work that he has to spend two to four hours a day going and coming. This should be included in an estimate of the working day. Half an hour in a New York subway is sometimes harder than four hours behind a store counter or a work bench. Then, too, a modern worker's working day does, and must, include a variety of activities outside office or shop; there is the labor union, the political club, the lodge—attention to which is often as important to success as any effort on the job.

* * * * *

NOT only have modern science and invention done nothing to shorten the true working day, but they are not even headed that way. The result of labor-saving machinery and methods has been merely to increase what we call the standard of living. This means an increase only in pointless luxury and needless waste. Science and invention, as the tools of modern industrialism, have released labor in one quarter only to divert it to a totally unnecessary piling up of material flubdubbery and hypercomplication of the already too complicated machinery of living.

* * * * *

MEN now, as always, work as long as they are willing to; and they have been so keyed up by present conditions that they are probably working a harder day than at any time since the Garden of Eden. Modern industry does not offer the slightest prospect of alleviation. The only chance for more loafing is through a will to do less work, a will to simplify rather than augment the standard of living, a will to so organize life that making a living will become an incident instead of an occupation—a will to drift.

That Typical American Dinner

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Of all the dishes suggested for entertaining Mr. Lloyd George, including stuffed roast turkey, pumpkin and apple pie, caramel ice cream, terrapin and canvas-back duck, mashed potatoes, coffee, etc., etc., none can compare with the most popular and typical American dinner, namely, the chop suey, to satisfy the hungry curiosity of the distinguished guest.

Chop suey is American in original production and in make, and therefore deserves an honorable mention.

THEODORE B. TU

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Permit me to add a shot of realism to the galaxy of effusions your letter columns have contained apropos an American dinner. A dinner peculiar to one section of this country, or one found only on the tables of a minority class, should not be adorned with the adjective American. A dinner that will have a national vogue during the coming winter, exceeding beyond calculation those menus presented by the epicureans, one that will be luscious to the gullets of millions, I offer the gastronomical nirvana of the unemployed proletariat: "Coffee and—" I believe this menu to be truly worthy of being known as an American dinner.

Seattle, Washington, November 19 WILLIAM FARGHER

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Permit me flatly to contradict W. B. of Magog, P. Q., who writes you that "cream that has come through a separator does not get as thick as cream that has risen in a pan." When my father was pastor at East Hardwick, between 1890 and 1900, we used to get from the East Hardwick creamery, for twenty cents a quart, cream so thick that very commonly it was quite impossible to pour it from a pint pitcher at all, and the only way to get it out was with a spoon, although it was perfectly fresh and sweet—much fresher, I understand, than cream risen in a pan could possibly be, for this was cream from a separator. It all depends on how you set your separator. What W. B. says about "thick clots" implies that between his clots there is something thinner in which the clots swim, hence that the mass as a whole must be capable of pouring, and that he is ignorant of sweet cream too thick to pour and thought the Drifter was exaggerating when he spoke of such. I don't mean to deny that W. B.'s cream is doubtless good stuff, and I wish I had any quantity of it from a teaspoonful to a gallon right now.

A year or two ago I went into a restaurant on the outskirts of Boston's Jewish tenement-house quarter and asked for strawberry ice cream. The man evidently misunderstood me and handed out a big saucer of strawberries smothered in plenty of real thick cream, about as thick as it could be and be easy to pour. I didn't know there was such cream in Boston, and I don't know now where or how he got it; but I ate the dish with delight, without hinting that he had given me the wrong thing. I believe this also was twenty cents.

The trouble with city milk is that the city man is willing to pay at milk prices for all the water that the cow will put into the milk. As long as the water is put in by the cow and not by a man it is "milk." Consequently the Holstein is the cow to raise for producing milk to be sold to the city jay, because the Holstein, the big black-and-white brute, is the one that will put most water in her milk and so will give most quarts for a ton of feed. The creamery, and presumably the condensed-milk factory, does not buy by the quart but by the amount of food in the milk; so the cow to raise for selling milk to the creamery is the Jersey, the one that puts in least water and gives out in her milk the greatest amount of food material for every ton of feed that she eats. A fair imitation of Holstein milk can be made by mixing with Jersey milk a considerable dose of water and a tiny bit of sugar. Convenient statistics for precise computation may be found in the New International Encyclopaedia under Cattle. When the city's increasing demand for milk taps a district that had previously been making butter and cheese, the farmers there begin to sell their Jerseys and buy Holsteins. I suppose the city man will learn to buy his milk at so much per unit of actual food value about as soon as he learns to buy his coal, big-factory fashion, at so much per B.T.U. and not per ton.

The Lively Generation

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: There is such a note of challenge in the unsigned article entitled The Languid Generation in The Nation of November 21 that those of us among the "languid generation" who have seen it feel the thrust keenly and stand ready to defend ourselves, as not a languid but as a lively generation. The charge that "the students in the colleges" are "not interested in anything" is, to our minds, preposterous and unwarrantable. The editors and managers of college undergraduate newspapers may find their task a baffling one, but that is not sufficient ground for assuming that their readers have no interests worth mentioning.

Generally speaking, the college girl's interests lie in three spheres: her activities within college; her own activities without college; and the activities of her family, friends, and the world at large. The girl's world within college absorbs the majority of her time and attention because its demands in these respects are great. Besides her academic work she has dramatics or music or athletics or literary jobs, and in the case of a large group of students she has some position in college government, or the Christian Association, or on her house staff which arouses her interest in that particular field. The academic work itself, however, does the most to locate and develop her interest. If she happens to be taking a course in English composition, which involves a study of current daily and weekly newspapers, well and good—the incentive is provided, she takes her newspapers, reads them, and establishes a contact with the outside world. But if she elects to take languages, or literature, or some branch of learning that does not necessarily have to do with international politics, it does not mean that she is any the less interested. And her interest is just as strong and just as worthwhile as that of the student taking English composition.

The college newspaper, therefore, must be content to be, for the most part, a chronicler of events of the college world. Its scope is limited, its news, even concerning college affairs, is necessarily confined. It should not expect more than a limited amount of interest and enthusiasm. Which fact prevents it from being an adequate judge of whether the college girl is interested in anything. The college girl herself must be the judge. I, for one, characterize her interest as "lively" rather than as lacking or "languid."

THE STRUGGLE FOR POWER IN MOSLEM ASIA

By
E. Alexander Powell

A BRILLIANT piece of political writing. The author has given the clearest account we have seen of the complicated affairs of the Near East—of Persia, Mesopotamia, Armenia, Syria, the new Turkey, Arabia and Palestine. He is perfectly frank about the bullying and jockeying of the great powers there, and has some exceedingly interesting recent history to relate. 12mo, 389 pages, with 4 maps.

A Man's Woman

The End of the House of Alard. By Sheila Kaye-Smith. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.

MY long-standing preference for English novels as against American novels is in no wise shaken by reading "The End of the House of Alard." It possesses, like many others from the same general source, solidity, richness, finish, background, planes, perspective. You may proclaim that you prefer a new growth from a new soil. You are free, of course, to choose between a shoot from an old tree and some seedling that starts up on its own account. In the one case you may get the continuing oak; in the other you may get, let us say, the improvising ailantus—which prompt and facile product, as I have lately learned in suburban Connecticut, is often ranked as a "weed."

Here in her latest work, as elsewhere, Miss Kaye-Smith closes a strong little fist on significant realities. In her selection and treatment of themes, and more especially in her selection and treatment of characters, she may fairly be called—to give the expression a slight twist—a man's woman. In "The Tramping Methodist" she shows a picaresque hero enmeshed in murder and love. Another early hero, Starbrace, rebels against family tyranny and runs away to join the smugglers. The protagonist of "Green Apple Harvest" exhibits the failures of an honest and earnest young man in love and religion. That of "Tamarisk Town" is a real-estate operator, as we should say, who is intent on turning a simple fishing-village into a seaside resort. The chief figure of "Sussex Gorse" concentrates with a not dissimilar intensity on country-side instead of seaside. Everywhere masculine interests, male melodrama, boundless virility, the rugged life of the yeoman farmer, with full cognizance of oath and beer, of crop rotation, and of barnyard activities. If one were to search our own fiction for a reasonably close analogue to Sheila Kaye-Smith, one might find it in Ottilie Liljencrantz, who, some twenty years ago, was busying herself with the heroes of Scandinavian saga and legend. In both cases the general tendency has been away from woman, with her griefs and grievances, great or little, and toward man, with the glory of his combat against fate and circumstance. Woman has her place, true; but she often takes her chances around and between.

Miss Kaye-Smith too has been "historical": her first things had to do with the earlier decades of the nineteenth century and with the middle of the eighteenth. And probably her present novel will rise to the dignity of the historical—however much that may amount to—with the passing of the years. It is an important socio-historical document.

Heretofore, Miss Kaye-Smith has been content usually to depict the yeoman class. If the "county families" existed for her they were in the background as a part of the set scene. But the Alards move to the front plane. They have lived too far into an unpropitious present, and their landed estate, now disintegrating, is almost the protagonist of the story: at least, four component parts of it give names to the four sections of which the book is made and provide the four general scenes of action—all quite as in a well-balanced play. In brief, an ancient historical estate has fallen upon evil times, and each of the younger generation, in his or her way and to his or her capacity, is called upon for sacrifice to the family and its land. One gives up love to marry money; another, faced with the prospect of marrying poor, gives up marriage altogether. Only two younger members escape. One rebels at Oxford, turns to mechanical pursuits, and finally, in reaction against an older brother who is an Anglican rector, takes refuge, the last male of the clan, in a Catholic order. Another accepts a young farmer to whom part of the consecrated yet heavily mortgaged acres have been sold. The book, in its essence, portrays the break-up of an established social system and records the vain sacrifices mistakenly made to maintain it.

The advantages of a stage already set are obvious; also those of characters and properties more or less "bespoke." The result need never be staleness, tedium, and constraint, when past is thus linked up with present and when future is foreshadowed. Where all is informed with an alert and penetrating spirit of social criticism, any donnée, however familiar, may be triumphantly saved and worked. Miss Kaye-Smith is by no means content with presenting a single detached figure, nor even a small group in the round; she prefers to employ, frieze-like, a series of relations and interrelations, with its wide opportunities for a comprehensive treatment of tendency and change. It is such a procedure that gives a novel the better half of its value.

HENRY B. FULLER

Primitive Mentality?

Primitive Mentality. By Lucien Lévy-Bruhl. Translated by Lilian A. Claire. The Macmillan Company. $5.

THE thesis which Lévy-Bruhl presents in this work, designed to follow and supplement his earlier "Fonctions Mentales dans les Sociétés Inférieures," can be given briefly. The mind of the primitive, he holds, operates in a manner which differs fundamentally from that of modern man. This difference is not inherent: " . . . it is due neither to incapacity or inaptitude, since those who have drawn our attention to this feature of primitive mentality expressly state that among them are 'minds quite as capable of scientific thought as those of Europeans.' " . . . The difference is purely cultural, and is due to the method of approach which the primitive takes toward his problems. Thus, we see that primitive man determines whether a thing should or should not be done by means of auguries, overcomes his enemy by magic, propitiates his forebears whose ghosts have the power to help or harm him, obeys his dreams, and heeds the omens he has been taught to deem significant.

Why is there to be found this attitude on the part of primitive man? "The solution of the enigma is . . . in the mystical and prelogical character of primitive mentality." "Instead of both cause and effect being perceptible in time and nearly always in space, as in our case, primitive mentality admits only one of the two conditions to be perceptible at one time; the other belongs to the sum total of those entities which are invisible and imperceptible to sense." The primitive man thinks in terms of this mystical universe, and therefore has no trouble, we are told, in accusing his friend of stealing his belongings because he saw the act done in a dream; the time-element and spacial relations involved do not trouble him. Again, the primitive mind is indifferent to secondary causes, according to Lévy-Bruhl. With us, it is different—brought face to face with phenomena entirely mysterious, we merely reflect that we cannot account for them because we do not know enough about them, and search for the secondary causes which underlie them, and thus finally solve our problems. Not so the savage; his world is one of "mystic participation"; death is not caused by natural forces but by magical ones; physiological manifestations are of no import when contrasted with mystical ones.

The thesis set forth above is supported by an overwhelming array of comparative data. There are many examples cited, and these, together with the attitude of the author that the basis of this special aspect of the savage is cultural rather than biological, make the work a persuasive one. But we do not believe that the thesis can be sustained. Thus, we are told that, to the savage, the world is a closed system, in which there is no room for accident or chance happenings. But this, indeed, is the very attitude of the most rigorous scientist, and while it must not be assumed that the ideas of the primitive and the scientist are alike, the attitude itself, if Lévy-Bruhl is correct in his description of it, is identical. Cause and effect is the first law of science—that the primitive visualizes his cause as mystical is merely because his historical background has never prompted him to search the field of nature. It would seem, further, that the author errs when he attributes to all civilized persons mental attitudes different from those of the savage. It may be true that the scientist, in his laboratory, reasons strictly and from secondary causes—but we do not have to look far to see this same scientist, out of his laboratory, going to church on Sunday to worship a Being who is not so far removed, psychologically, from the spirits of the savage! Ask the man on the street what makes the light go on when you press a button, and he will reply "Electricity." But does he try to reason about the "secondary causes" involved? Not even the most enthusiastic supporter of Lévy-Bruhl would argue so.

It may be true that we believe that death occurs "when the heart stops racing." But it is also true that we talk of death as occurring when the soul, an essentially mystical something, leaves the body. It may be true that the primitive man worships his fetishes, and does as they demand, but one does not have to search far to see how the flower of our own culture reacts to the fetish of the flag or the words "patriotism," "constitution," or "democracy." The fetishes may be different—the psychology is the same. And as for the importance of dreams—any Freudian can tell you that their interpretation is not restricted to primitive man. The author admits, too, that cause and effect as we know it, is realized by the primitive man when he makes his implements or his weapons. But the significance of this fact is not realized, nor is it sufficiently exploited in this work, for it is of great importance in considering the processes of "primitive mentality," granting that there may be anything which is peculiarly such.

The translation of the work is excellent, and nothing is lost by it. Not as much can be said of the bibliographic material used by the author. The American data, particularly, are highly insufficient—the superb series of the Jessup Expedition, the many works from the Bureau of American Ethnology, the American Museum of Natural History, the University of California, and the Canadian Geological Survey are not utilized at all. And while the data on Africa and the South Seas are reasonably complete, it is significant that the author has rested his case mainly on reference to those continents about which there is the least exact knowledge.

MELVILLE J. HERSKOVITS

World Politics

History of Modern Europe 1878-1919. By G. P. Gooch. Henry Holt and Company. $5.

IN the third and second centuries B.C. the Romans fought a series of guerres à outrance with the Carthaginians. Carthage was destroyed; the history of the struggle has come down to us only through Roman sources; and Punic faith has since been synonymous with bad faith. In the World War England controlled the seas and the channels of information; and for several years it looked as if the Hun of English propaganda would attain the dignity of history. But the story of the recent war is not likely to be told to posterity exclusively from the victor's point of view. On the contrary, the most reliable sources of information are those put at our disposal through investigations of the archives of Germany and Austria by official and semi-official committees. To these must be added the archives of England's turncoat ally Russia and, less reliable though no less important, a mass of memoirs, speeches, and correspondence of many of the actors on both sides and the official blue, yellow, orange, white, and other highly colorful books of the interested Powers. He who would assay the difficult task of summarizing all this but recently available knowledge must have mastered the art of history and be prepared to allow prejudice to yield to fact.

Mr. Gooch's qualifications for such an undertaking are already well known. In the present work he has made use of almost everything of value on the history of international diplomacy since the Congress of Berlin, and very few are the moot points of that most mooted of periods to which he has not brought some very definite light. What it must have cost in the sacrifice of the personal element alone is attested by the fact that, Englishman though he is, only once does he allow himself to call the Germans names (on p. 388 he says that the remarkable treaty of alliance at Björko in 1905 between the Czar and the Kaiser was "treacherously extorted" by the latter) and only once does he permit his patriotism to run off with his better judgment (on p. 256 he grieves that "Great Britain has never obtained credit on the Continent for her disinterested humanitarianism"). Aside from these two lapses, international events since 1879, which he chose as a point of departure rather than the more reasonable date of 1870 because he wishes this book to be regarded as the continuation of Fyffe's "History of Modern Europe 1792-1878," are described as the sorry muddle they were, all nations being held equally guilty for the tragic culmination. "The root of the evil lay in the division of Europe into two armed camps . . . and the conflict was the offspring of fear no less than ambition. . . . It is a mistake to imagine that the conflict of 1914 took Europe unawares, for the statesmen and soldiers had been expecting it and preparing for it for many years. It is also a mistake to attribute exceptional wickedness to the governments who, in the words of Lloyd George, stumbled and staggered into the war."

If the book does not remain "standard" for some years to come it will be because new light is being shed upon the history of the last fifty years almost every day and what is a good account now must soon become obsolete. Sometime in the future, England, France, and the United States will open their archives, and it will perhaps be found that the parts played by them were not so much more commendable than Germany's as Mr. Gooch, in his anxiety not to assign motives unless he can find documentary proof for them, has represented. It is a result of this anxiety that in the early part of this work Russian statesmen, whose secrets the Bolsheviks have laid bare to the world, are revealed as the grossest materialists as compared with the English statesmen, for whose motives only their own words are available as evidence. And as German statesmen succeed the Russians as the disturbers of the pax Britannica, they inherit also the gross materialism of the latter, thanks to Kautsky and his associates and to the editors of "Die Grosse Politik der Europäischen Kabinette." It is not Mr. Gooch's fault that that is the effect his book creates. He himself is quite convinced that the idea of a guilty nation is based upon a myth. But where he had to use, for instance, a semi-official report in the Quarterly Review for his source of information on England's part in the Bagdad Railway negotiations or Cook's "How Britain Strove for Peace" on her part in the negotiations with Germany since 1905, it was inevitable that he should leave an impression entirely to the disadvantage of the German negotiators, upon whom there is more information to be had, unless he had been willing to grant that there are more things in heaven and earth than are dreamt of in official and semi-official documents. If Mr. Gooch is at fault in not granting this, it is well to remember that even a momentary departure from documentary material might have lifted him into the thin air of speculation with little hope of regaining terra firma.

Upon some of Mr. Gooch's conclusions there is still room for debate. Many will disagree with him in his belief that it is mere legend that Great Britain's hostility to Germany originated in commercial jealousy rather than in naval rivalry, as he prefers to believe. Not all historians will be as ready to excuse Grey's secret diplomacy in the decade before the war, to applaud Lloyd George's moderation at Versailles, and to overlook the deliberate plan of aggressive alliance promoted by Izvolski and Poincaré that is so conclusively shown in the documents published by De Siebert and Marchand. Perhaps, too, in view of Dobrolorsky's none too convincing denial, there will be some hesitation in believing that Sukhomlinoff carried out the general mobilization of the Russian army despite the Czar's order to the contrary. Nor is there yet sufficient ground for a definite statement that the Lusitania was not armed on its fatal voyage.

But these are points which in the present heat of controversy probably occupy a more important place than they will for posterity. In view of the existing state of knowledge and passions it is hard to see how a better epitome of world politics from the Congress of Berlin to the Congress of Versailles could have been written.

Louis R. Gottschalk

Alexander Herzen

The Memoirs of Alexander Herzen. Parts I and II. Translated by J. D. Duff. Yale University Press. $4.

I CAN think of no greater service that I might render my friends in the capacity of reviewer than to recommend the reading of this book. These memoirs are in a sense the history of Russia and in another sense the study of a spiritual adventure, as well as the chronicle of a noble man. Through anecdote and biography, description and reflections, the enormous panorama from Napoleon's capture of Moscow to the revolutions of the fifties is unfolded. The interest that the volume evokes is nothing short of amazing; the wit and wisdom it contains is a source of continuous delight; and the enthusiasm it arouses is a measure of the reader's soul. Obviously then, it is nothing like the average autobiography. It is rather an artist's portfolio filled with pastels, vivid and beautiful; it is a repository of a cosmopolitan's opinions on national traits and customs.

Alexander Herzen was a name to conjure with among the revolutionaries of pre-Revolution Russia. There were many who had sacrificed as much and suffered even more for Russian freedom, but few had served the cause of liberty with such unselfish and unswerving devotion. Though a member of the nobility he chose prison and exile by throwing down the gauntlet to Power. At the age of twenty-two he was imprisoned for almost a year and then sent into exile on the borders of Siberia for five years. On his release he was forced to live under police supervision, but that did not curtail his activities. A year later he was again arrested and exiled for three years.

In 1847 Herzen was permitted to leave Russia never to return. In France, Italy, Switzerland, but mainly in England, he spent the remaining twenty-three years of his life publishing a Russian paper that enjoyed an enormous though underground circulation—even the Czar read the forbidden magazine. Both at home and abroad this Russian Voltaire was the intimate of brilliant and now famous men. The older members of his circle had been the friends "of Voltaire and Beaumarchais, of Diderot and Casti"; the younger were Carlyle, Pushkin, Heine, Proudhon, Bakunin, and Darwin. That Herzen gave as much as he received is obvious to the reader of these memoirs. His penetrating and logical mind anticipated much that has since been associated with one great man or another.

Likewise, his discussions of the types represented by the people he meets are strikingly true to the latest revelations of psychology though happily uncluttered by the semi-scientific jargon that this study has loosed upon a sufficiently miserable world.

"The English speak French even worse than the Germans; but they merely mutilate the language, whereas the German vulgarizes it. . . . Able men who take up some science late in life often show a tendency to rearrange the furniture, so to speak. . . . By no means stupid, she was full of an icy enthusiasm in her talk, she abounded in commonplaces about virtue and devotion, she knew history and geography by heart, spoke French with repulsive correctness, and concealed a high opinion of herself under an artificial and Jesuitical humility. These traits are common to all pedants in petticoats. . . . This generosity excited the wrath and displeasure of the 'charitable' ladies, who were afraid of giving pleasure by their charity, and afraid of being more charitable than was absolutely necessary. . . . In fact, he spoke with a clearness which was capable, by its copiousness, of obscuring the simplest topic. . . . To see oneself in print is one of the strongest artificial passions of an age corrupted by books."

Herzen knows himself as well as others. In a paragraph he has summed up his character: "Though I was shaken for a time by Vitberg's influence [toward mysticism], my positive turn of mind held its own nevertheless. It was not my destiny to be carried up to the third heaven; I was born to inhabit earth alone. Tables never turn at my touch, rings never quiver when I look at them. The daylight of thought is my element, not the moonlight of imagination." Throughout he indicates the warm preferences and strong prejudices of a brave mind.

It is not often that "a supreme master of that superb instrument, the Russian language," finds so satisfactory a translator as Mr. Duff who has rendered the concise, incisive, and ironical phrases of Herzen with truth and poetry. This volume holds but the first two parts of the original; I trust the remaining three will soon follow.

Only a Preface

A Preface to Life. By Edwin Justus Mayer. Boni and Liveright. $2.50.

EDWIN JUSTUS MAYER turns a verbal flipflop and finds himself sprawling next to God. "A Preface to Life" is the intellectual autobiography of a chaotic young man brilliantly, if not always lucidly, engaged with his chaos. It is a very significant book. For it bears witness that a young man may be a more than adequate shipping clerk, an ingenious salesman, a shrewd Wall Streeter, a craftsman in the movies, the while his mind is roving passionately from Shelley to Shaw, from Dickens to Meredith, from Byron to Blake.

That such a young man has the gift of expression is important, for most men who write about Wall Street, The Retailer, or The Movies have never been flamingly aware of the subtlety and nobility of life, and most men who vibrate to Meredith, Shelley, and Blake find it impossible to realize the vital meaning of the Man Next Door and His Wife.

"A Preface to Life" makes me want to say to Mr. Mayer: "Splendid! Now write a book!" For he has demonstrated that he has the Nietzschean mood if not the Nietzschean sweep, the eloquence if not the articulateness of the Waldo Frank who wrote "Our America," and a seriousness which, while it does not contain the beautiful sobriety of Matthew Arnold, has reach and velocity.

It is the sort of book which, I fancy, every first-rate writer has written and tossed into the waste-basket, but the sort of book which only a first-rate writer could write. Since it is the first one of its kind which has seen the light, it is welcome as a record of what a writer thinks of himself. But now we want what is more important—what he thinks of the world, his world, his world in terms of our own experience.

When Mr. Mayer sketches with a few vivid sentences the story of the Marvelous Boy, a pallid youth who was going to write a great poem and then commit suicide but who ended as a slick-haired salesman, he is making notes for what he should and must do. The Marvelous Boy, in the long run, is much more important, if Mr. Mayer should bring to bear on him insight and dramatic force, than Mr. Mayer's own thoughts about himself.

When Mr. Mayer writes the sonnet beginning

"O beauty cannot ever be the same
    Since you have loved me through the loveless night;
And since the fluent curves of your delight
    Have rounded the rough sharpness which I am" . . .

he is representing emotion authentically—he is using rather than revealing his gifts—and more poetry like that should be coming from him now.

In talking about Southern California he says: "But it has an infinite charm, and charm is more destructive of deep-rooted judgments than anything except romantic love. . . . There are swords out on every street in Manhattan, and Broadway is a dagger in your breast, but this spell is a mild perpetual dream in Nirvana." Brilliant phrases, the result of poetic and penetrating thought, the crystallization of many things seen and mulled over. And one wishes that one could have that poetic and penetrating thought itself, and in terms of the things seen and mulled over. The sentences as they stand belong only in a letter to a friend.

The most arresting sentence in the book to me is: "But when I turned earthward, they [people] interested me as fascinating, repulsive, and odd personalities, endowed with moving and amusing qualities." Let us have them, Mr. Mayer, through your eyes, and then we shall have you as we never can through a book about yourself. SAMPSON RAPHAELSON

Books in Brief

The Temple and Other Poems. Translated by Arthur Waley. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

Of all the translators now engaged with Chinese and Japanese poetry Mr. Waley is by far the best, for he combines skill with scholarship in a unique degree. The present volume of versions from the Chinese, his third to date, departs into a new field—that of the longer poems of two thousand years ago which are comprehended under the term "fu." Readers who expect the compactness of Li Po will be disappointed by the flowing, elaborate compositions here of poets like Po Chü-i and Sung Yü. Unprejudiced readers will be delighted; and incidentally they will find a great deal of information on a very obscure subject in Mr. Waley's fifty-odd pages of introduction.

The Cinder Buggy. By Garet Garrett. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.

A novel of hot love and cold steel, in which one may learn considerably more about the profits of a great industry than about the promptings of a great emotion. Mr. Garrett composes in short sentences; his story moves rapidly and he knows his background. The seeker after a business novel will find this much to his liking.

Collected Poems: Second Series. By W. H. Davies. Harper and Brothers. $2.

Mr. Davies's title is misleading, since a number of the poems included here were also included in "Collected Poems: First Series," published in America seven years ago. Most of the volume, however, is recent, and the whole of it, as those who know the author do not need to be told, is very fine. The remarkable thing about this modern Herrick is not that he can write his kind of poetry so well but that he can keep it up so long. Doubtless when he is done he will have matched his seventeenth-century master in sheer bulk—by no means the least impressive virtue of Herrick.

The Nation's Poetry Prize

THE NATION offers an annual poetry prize of $100 for the best poem submitted by an American poet in a contest conducted by The Nation each year between Thanksgiving and New Year's Day. The rules for the contest in 1923 are as follows:

1. Each manuscript submitted in the contest must reach the office of The Nation, 20 Vesey Street, New York City, not earlier than Saturday, December 1, and not later than Monday, December 31, plainly marked on the outside of the envelope, "For The Nation's Poetry Prize."

2. Manuscripts must be typewritten and must have the name of the author in full on each page of the manuscript submitted.

3. As no manuscripts submitted in this contest will in any circumstances be returned to the author it is unnecessary to inclose return postage. An acknowledgment of the receipt of each manuscript, however, will be sent from this office.

4. No more than three poems from the same author will be admitted to the contest.

5. No restriction is placed upon the subject or form of poems submitted, which may be in any meter or in free verse. It will be impossible, however, to consider poems which are more than 400 lines in length, or which are translations, or which are in any language other than English. Poems arranged in a definite sequence may, if the author so desires, be counted as a single poem.

6. The winning poem will be published in the Midwinter Literary Supplement of The Nation, to appear February 13, 1924.

7. Besides the winning poem, The Nation reserves the right to purchase at its usual rates any other poem submitted in the contest.

The judges of the contest are the editors of The Nation. Poems should in no case be sent to them personally.

"The Failures"

THIS translation, a faithful and skilful one, of H. R. Lenormand's "Les Ratés" is the best piece of contemporary dramatic literature which the Theater Guild has produced since St. John Ervine's "Jane Clegg." It is, indeed, one of the two or three best modern dramas seen on the New York stage. The contemporary drama of France has fallen upon very evil days indeed. Only the most fitful gleams of light shoot through the darkness of these days. The brazen clamor and ugly competence of the Batailles and the Bernsteins fill ear and eye. Happily for a dramatic literature once glorious for so long Charles Vildrac wrote "Le Paquebot Ténacité" and Lenormand wrote "Le Simoun" and "Les Ratés." "Le Simoun," a study of the corruption of European officials in Algiers, would have had no particular meaning for our audiences. "The Failures," which Reinhardt produced in Vienna, which has been seen in Prague and Rome and Christiania, was the fitting work of Lenormand to produce here.

The story of the play is very simple on the side of action, as all important stories in literature are. The technique will be called narrative by those who prefer names to things. In fourteen scenes, of which one was not injudiciously omitted by the Guild, Lenormand has portrayed a series of events and emotions that, highly specific and concrete in their character, move us with sorrow over all mortal things and enlarge the vision of all of life. That, as I shall and must not be tired of repeating, is the mark of true art, that it is universal and enlarging in final effect in exact proportion to its truth to humble and ordinary circumstance and thought and character.

Who are these failures? They are of that great company of modern men and women to be found everywhere in whom aspiration outruns both talent and character. They do love art above all else. The genuineness of their devotion gives them their tragic dignity. But they have not that peculiar union of talent with iron pertinacity which alone can lead aspiration to achievement. Hence they are in a sense lost souls. The world derides them. And all forces are on the world's side. Good sense is on that side and even, necessarily, the attitude of the actual producing artist who must, in order to produce, have a good foundation of certain bourgeois virtues. Lenormand has stated the case of these wretched ones with a faultless tenderness, understanding, truth, power. He gives them one great moment of irony, of self irony. He condemns through the medium of his treatment only one of these failures. It is Larnaudy who will not admit that he is a failure, who gets drunk on hollow verbiage, who is damned because he does not know that he is damned. Beautiful and pathetic, on the other hand, is the portrait of Montredon, who knows, none so well, what he has become, who has betrayed the art he adores with an unwilling kiss because he needed the thirty pieces of silver to hold soul and body together.

These are merely the implications and minor characters of the fable and bear witness to the extraordinary richness of the play's humanity and workmanship. Its central theme is the story of two lovers who, caught in this toil of failure, wound, lacerate, outrage, and finally destroy each other. Two true lovers. In all the endless gabble about love on our stage, gabble which shows mere blindness and mere spiritual vulgarity, it was infinitely refreshing to come upon that passage in "The Failures" in which the lover reassures his mistress and takes up her worn little gloves which she never succeeds in quite mending and which move him so. . . . That is life; that is love.

The directing of the production by Mr. Stark Young is very able. There is humanity; there is precision. I waited with some uneasiness for Scene 10, fearing that Mr. Young would have yielded to a touch of the fantastic. I was immediately reassured. His feet remained firmly on the earth, where one's feet belong. Lee Simonson in the several sets required brings the art of giving hints which fill the imagination with an authentic sense of reality to an unheard of perfection. Only in the cathedral scene did my imagination halt and hesitate for a moment. But perhaps that was a shortcoming in me. Among the actors I want to begin by saying something of Dudley Digges as Montredon. I have heard Mr. Digges called a "reliable" actor with an ironic hint. I wish to call him so without the mild irony. His unfailing and unfaltering projection of a human being from within himself and yet not himself—that is acting. Mr. Ben Ami in the chief male part was uneven, too emphatic, and personal in all the level passages. To the play's tensest moments, however, he rose with a rich and stormy eloquence. Miss Winifred Lenihan, in the corresponding woman's part, surpassed all her previous performances. She was gentle, tender, strong, quite unobtrusive and yet quite beautifully there at every moment. Excellence akin to that of Mr. Digges was displayed in other parts by Miss Helen Westley, Mr. Erskine Sanford, and Mr. Henry Crosby.

Helping Russia Help Herself*

We print below in condensed form the report of Dr. Joseph Rosen, director in Russia of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee's reconstruction work. Dr. Rosen is well known in Russia and the United States as a revolutionary worker and as an agricultural expert.

There are three outstanding features of the Joint Distribution Committee's reconstruction work in Russia which give it a particular interest: (1) The work was entirely non-sectarian in character; (2) it was carried on almost entirely through the medium of local peasants and workmen's cooperatives; (3) the aid given was not gratis, but the individual recipients had to pay the cooperative of which they were members for the services and help given.

The A.J.J.D.C. is an American organization for the relief of Jewish war victims in Europe, but in Russia all its activities have been placed on a non-sectarian basis. Of the $7,800,000 spent by it in Russia since 1921, about $6,500,000 have been devoted to relief, pure and simple—to adult feeding during the famine period without difference of race or religion; to the feeding of 300,000 children (on the same basis) in the Ukraine during nine months of 1922-1923; to the distribution of clothing, shoes, fuel, etc.

For its reconstruction program the A.J.J.D.C. provided $1,290,000 with the idea that an impetus could be given toward the economic recovery of the Jews in the Ukraine and White Russia, who had been particularly hard hit by the Great War, the civil conflicts, and the unparalleled pogroms. But it was understood that the economic recovery must be general if the Jewish population were to get any permanent benefit from the help given and therefore the reconstruction work, no less than the relief work, was done on a non-sectarian basis. The figures which are now available demonstrate quite conclusively how non-sectarian the activities of the A.J.J.D.C. have been to date. Of 100,000 acres plowed at least 70 per cent belonged to Russian peasants. Of 50,000 families on the land receiving agricultural aid, more than half were non-Jewish.

A. Tractor Squad Work

We purchased in the United States eighty-six tractors, shipped them to Russia, and organized ten squads in the southern district. It took a great deal of work to have these squads properly organized. The Soviet Government has greatly assisted us in this work by giving free transportation of the tractors, fuel, supplies, and men. The tractors arrived in Odessa and were delivered to the final points of destination in good time.

We purchased our kerosene and oil at the oil wells in the Grojny and Baku districts in tank cars, the Government supplying free railroad transportation from the wells to our tractor bases. Our tractors have not lost a single day on account of lack of fuel. To recover our expenses for kerosene and oil, we charged the farmers five poods of wheat per desiatin of land plowed, the grain to be delivered partly from the 1923, partly from the 1924 crop.

We plowed about 100,000 acres of land during the season, which is a very good acreage for eighty-six small tractors. The average work of such a tractor in the states amounts to about 300 acres a year, as our farmers plow only thirty or forty days during the season. By continuous operation we accomplished about three seasons' work in one. At the same time we taught the local people how to operate the tractors.

Although we did the work for non-Jewish as well as Jewish farmers, we made it a rule that no plowing was to be done for any villages which participated in pogroms. From many of these villages we had petitions asking us to do some plowing for them, and expressing regret for the criminal activities of some of their villagers. All the work was done in cooperation with the local cooperative organizations, which are again functioning largely due to our assistance. The arrangement was that each local cooperative organization was to lay out plans and make all arrangements with the individual colonists. The land of the widows and orphans was plowed first, then the land of the people who had no horses or plows, and then some communal lands. Figuring the cost of doing this work, we must say that tractor plowing under present Russian conditions is from 40 to 50 per cent higher than plowing with horses or oxen, but most of the land we worked had not been plowed for eight to ten years, and therefore was in such condition that the plowing could not have been done at all except by tractors. All the Russian agricultural organizations are extremely interested in our tractor work because this was the first time such work was done in Russia on a large scale, with a properly organized service, a thing almost unknown in Russia before. Several commissions delegated by the Department of Agriculture and by other organizations to observe our tractor squad have rendered reports which were flattering indeed.

The general conditions are much better than they were a year ago. The winter crops were especially good. While there are still hundreds of houses without roofs or windows there is plenty of grain and straw everywhere, and life in general is more hopeful and even more cheerful. But the people still have no clothing; many are literally naked. Here we touch on the most important general problem of Russian life, namely, the difference in the prices of farm products and manufactured products. Farm products are below the pre-war level, while manufactured products are extremely high. To help the situation somewhat, the A.J.J.D.C. has made a special loan to agricultural cooperatives of $10,000 to purchase cotton and jute cloth to be used by the farmers for clothing.

B. Multiplication of Pure-Bred Seed

The second line of work was the multiplication of pure-bred seed. Even to people superficially familiar with agricultural problems, it is self-evident that the quality of the seed used by the farmers is of the utmost importance. The quality of Russian seed has greatly deteriorated during the years of war and revolution. In this phase of our work we also had the fullest cooperation of the Moscow Department of Agriculture and the Ukrainian Improved Seed Society. They supplied additional quantities of seed and some funds, and placed at our disposal the staff and equipment of a number of agricultural experiment stations. We have organized about 252 seed-breeding stations and plots where the seed brought from America, Germany, Denmark, and Norway was used for propagation and multiplication purposes. These breeding stations have produced sufficient quantities of seed (corn, barley, wheat, oats, vegetables, etc.) to be distributed among the farmers next year to plant not less than 3,000,000 acres of land. This work has received a good deal of attention in Russia, and the Department of Agriculture had a special exhibit devoted to this work at the All-Russian Exposition in Moscow.

In addition to this pure-bred seed for multiplication purposes we distributed through the cooperative societies in our colonies and villages for planting in the spring of 1923 seed loans amounting to 170,000 poods of grain, 47,000 poods of potatoes, and over 5,000 poods of clover forage and vegetable seeds.

We went to Europe this Summer to do your Christmas shopping for you.

Odd, exquisite things we picked up over there; often only one or two of a kind.

Each steamer reaching these shores brings us exquisite hand-made articles, such as laces, embroideries, handkerchiefs, jewelry, leather goods, objects in skillfully carved wood including cuckoo-clocks, beautifully hand-wrought silver and brass, ivory pendants, charming beaded bags, toys and dolls, and innumerable other things.

It is our task to distribute in the United States the products of the home workers of Mid-Europe. We sell articles made by the people who are anxious and willing to work; people who, in these tragic days, are thus spared the humiliation of begging. They ask for only one thing, that the good people of the rest of the world buy the work of their home industry, so that they may obtain the American dollars with which they can purchase food and all of life's necessities.

The list of items is necessarily incomplete, but it is offered in the hope of showing that our undertaking merits your support. We want to give fair value to our customers, even as we give fair pay to those people of Central Europe who want to work rather than plead for alms.

Recognizing the fact that our list can, at its best, give but a general idea of the goods shown herein, we only ask you to order, not to buy. The money accompanying your order is merely held in trust while the goods are shipped and examined.

We suggest that in sending us your order, you let us make the selection for you by telling us how much you wish to apply to each gift and whether it is to be a present for a man, woman or child.

We distributed for planting 100,000 grapevines brought from France and 150,000 seedlings of hops in the Volhynia (hop) district.

C. DISTRIBUTION OF LIVE STOCK

The next step was the distribution of live stock. During the war millions of horses were killed and died from disease. The farmers lost at least 50 per cent of their live stock, if not more, and it was the Jewish farmers especially who suffered in this respect. Before the war the Jewish colonists in the Cherson and Ekaterinoslav provinces had about 12,000 horses, in 1923 they had only 3,300; the number of cows in the colonies decreased from 9,000 in 1916 to 4,400 in 1923.

1. CATTLE

We had an appropriation of $100,000 for live stock, and our plans were to purchase horses outside of Russia, in Hungary or Czecho-Slovakia, but after due consideration of the matter we decided to purchase horses in the Ukraine on the right side of the Dnieper River, in the Zhitomir province, where they were cheaper and more plentiful than in other districts of the country. The Russian Government has given us a good deal of assistance in this matter by granting free transportation for our men and the animals, and also veterinary service. These expenses were practically equivalent to the cost of the horses. Twenty special trains that had the right of way were placed at our disposal, and in a number of cases it took only three days to take the horses from Zhitomir to Cherson and Nikolaieff, where it ordinarily would take from ten days to two weeks for a freight train to make the trip. The horses and cows were distributed through the cooperative societies. The societies would decide which members of the colony needed the horses or cows first. The horses were charged at the price of the actual cost, in terms of grain. Another arrangement was that a farmer receiving a horse could work for a widow and be credited for this work as partial payment against his horse account. A good many farmers have paid for their horses during the season by doing work for others who had no horses.

We also distributed over one thousand cows and fifty bulls for breeding. Most of these cows were given to families of widows with children. Cows are paid for in terms of grain or in terms of milk.

2. CHEESE MANUFACTURING COOPERATIVES

In most of our colonies we organized cheese manufacturing cooperatives, and our traveling instructors taught the farmers how to manufacture and improve the quality of their cheese. A central cooperative was formed at Charkov to which all the cheese is shipped and this cooperative sells it for them at a profitable price. In this activity the Government has also given us assistance by placing at the disposal of the cooperatives refrigerator cars. These cheese cooperatives are a paying proposition, and the money realized from the sale of the cheese constituted the chief working capital of the agricultural cooperatives until the new crops came in.

3. DISTRIBUTION OF FARM MACHINERY AND IMPLEMENTS

The next item was the distribution of farm machinery and implements, outside of tractors. This was also accomplished through the local cooperatives, the implements to be paid for in terms of grain. Altogether we distributed 1,000 plows, 2,000 harrows, 1,400 cultivators, 400 buckers, 500 mowing machines, 500 seed cleaners, 300 wagons. In several instances we assisted in organizing cooperative shops for the manufacture of wagons, wheels, and small implements, also farm machinery repair shops.

4. ASSISTANCE TO SETTLERS

Another very important phase of our work was assistance to new settlers or families taking up some form of farm work as a means of making a living. Owing to economic conditions in Russia there is a movement among the Russian Jews to take up farming as a livelihood. For a time, when the new economic

THE MYSTERIES OF THE PEOPLE,

or, HISTORY OF A PROLETARIAN FAMILY ACROSS THE AGES

By EUGENE SUE

WHEN the name of EUGENE SUE is mentioned one thinks at once of THE MYSTERIES OF PARIS and THE WANDERING JEW. Upon further reflection one recalls that he wrote other romances, notably a series entitled THE SEVEN CARDINAL SINS. The average Sue reader concludes that that is all that Eugene Sue ever wrote—or at any rate, that that is all that was ever translated of his works. The conclusion is erroneous. Sue wrote a work which in importance, in grandeur, in brilliancy far exceeds any of the aforementioned. That work, effectively if not formally suppressed, is entitled

THE MYSTERIES OF THE PEOPLE

That work has been translated into English from the original French by the eminent scholar, the late Daniel De Leon. THE MYSTERIES OF THE PEOPLE is unquestionably Sue's masterpiece. Into that work he poured his passion for freedom and democracy; on that work he lavished his scholarship, his learning, the result of his historical researches. For THE MYSTERIES OF THE PEOPLE is not merely a work of fiction, though fiction it is, fiction sublimated. It is fiction and history so blended as to produce a work truly unique in the annals of literature.

The purpose of Sue is to trace the struggle of mankind from slavery and oppression to freedom and democracy. To that end he pictures the history of two families: the family of Joel, representing the downtrodden and oppressed, and the family of Neroweg, representing the ruling, the autocratic classes. In a wonderful panorama, with glowing colors and a tremendous sweep, Sue depicts the age long struggle between oppressor and oppressed, between social rights and social wrongs. And with the marshalling of much historical data, with the passion of the Prophets, he makes clear to the reader that while at any given time autocracy and social wrongs may prevail, in the long run it is democracy, the spirit of freedom, that survives, while autocracy and oppression, the spirit of slavery and darkness, go down to ignominious defeat.

What they think of Sue's MYSTERIES OF THE PEOPLE

I have found the books most interesting because of the help they give me in picturing to myself what went on in other days. . . . If one is interested in history, I think they would have value to him.—Prof. Ernest C. Moore of Harvard University, Division of Education (formerly of Yale University).

I think that your group would make no mistake in possessing yourselves of the historic novels of Eugene Sue. I believe that you would find them surprisingly modern, and, indeed, considerably futuristic as well. For we have not yet caught up with his vision. . . .—Rev. Charles Fleischer, leader of "The Sunday Common," Boston, Mass.

THIS WORK IS HISTORY IN ITS MOST PLEASING GARB: IT IS FICTION TURNED TO A MOST USEFUL PURPOSE. It fulfills with equal success the two important ends of modern endeavor—IT INSTRUCTS WHILE IT ENTERTAINS. IT ENTERTAINS WHILE IT INSTRUCTS.

THE MYSTERIES OF THE PEOPLE, owing to the great manufacturing cost, has been out of print for a few years. Originally published by us in 21 cloth bound volumes it has now been assembled into 3 beautiful volumes, bound in flexible artcraft leather, printed on thin, opaque paper in large, clear type. The set contains upward of 5,000 pages.

policy was inaugurated, it seemed that Jews would go back to trading, but they soon realized that there is very little chance now for the small trader, and this movement to take up some productive work is still very important. Many thousands of Jewish families have taken up farming and are anxious to continue it if given the opportunity.

The establishment of workmen's cooperative banks, known as "loan kassas," constitutes the reconstruction work for the city people. Eighty-two kassas to make loans to artisans for cooperative purposes were organized up to September 1, 1923. At present there is a stable currency in Russia, the chernovitz, which inside of Russia is much more desirable than dollars or pounds, as the rate of chernovitz in Soviet Russia is proportionately higher that than of foreign currencies.

The loan kassas make loans in this new currency, and this safeguards them from the loss of their capital through the depreciation of the ruble. The number of families benefiting from our kassas is not less than 20,000. Some of the kassas have developed special lines of work, organizing producers' cooperatives, such as the shoemakers' cooperative in Vinnitza, woodworkers' cooperative in Zhitomir, metal workers' cooperative in Odessa, mill producers' cooperative in Ekaterinoslav, etc. The majority of them have developed operations in cooperative buying of raw materials and tools, and others have organized cooperative selling of products.

In August of this year representatives of all the kassas in the Ukraine held a conference in Kharkov and organized a central service bureau which acts as a clearing house for the purchase or sale of goods in every section of the country.

5. Trade Schools

Our trade-school work was carried on in cooperation with the ICA (Jewish Colonization Association) and the ORT (Society for the Promotion of Trade and Agriculture among the Jews in Russia). . . . It is interesting to note that we have rendered assistance in this work to forty-two trade schools and three agricultural schools teaching a dozen trades to nearly 4,000 boys and girls.

Italy's Terror Goes On

LITTLE is heard of disorder or disaffection in Italy but occasionally an article is published like that printed below, indicating continued resistance to Fascist rule.

To the Workers and Workers' Organizations of all Countries:

As reaction in Italy proceeds with its work of destruction, the breaking up of surviving syndical organizations continues along with the persecution and murder of workers, while the prisons are still being crowded with victims. The courts are overrun with comrades involved in cases which have been forced to trial by the police and judicial authorities during the last three years of close cooperation between the courts, the police, and Fascism. . . .

Even in these last few days the Arezzo trial against the Valdarno miners and the Turin trial against the Minervino Murge peasants have both resulted in outrageous verdicts against our comrades, who were insulted with impunity in the courtroom by the lawyers, the press men, and the Fascist caliphs, who in some cases even attempted to lynch the condemned men. During the last few days the comrades of Valdarno, Minervino Murge, and Cerignola have been sentenced to terms amounting altogether to more than fifteen centuries. The sentences vary from 10, 20, to 30 years, very few being granted easier terms.

Comrades! . . .

Think of the victims in these life and death struggles; think of these comrades who may perhaps never leave their cells, because they refused to ask for pardon from the judges of bourgeois reaction.

LET no one be deceived by the inspired reports that conditions are getting better in the Ruhr; that the French are beginning to have their way; that the troops are being reduced in the cities; that the Paris magnates have now decided that they are going to be good, and, after having done their utmost to destroy German credit and financial ability, are now going to help Germany to get on her feet. The situation is not one whit less critical than it was. Fridtjof Nansen has just uttered a solemn warning that the next war approaches rapidly. It is not going to be averted by any halfway measures, or by any sudden French decision to change their policy after the mischief has been done. There is no cessation of the misery and the suffering in the Ruhr and in all Germany, no improvement in the situation of the neutrals against whom France struck most serious blows when she entered the Ruhr. In short, there can be no health in Europe until the whole entanglement is straightened out. From London come reports that the French and English were near an agreement just prior to the election in England, under which the French were to consent to a reduction of the Ruhr occupation to a "simple system of financial and economic control with British participation," such control to be "extended progressively to other regions in Germany," with permanent military occupation of the Rhine, but with France abandoning all support of the Separatist criminals. It will be a cause for rejoicing, indeed, if the defeat of Mr. Baldwin has blocked this scheme, which in its essence meant simply an agreement that England should share in the swag and keep silent in return for certain concessions, as in the Mediterranean.

ONE index of the appalling difficulties of life in Germany is given by the price of a single newspaper. A copy of the Berliner Tageblatt cost 5,000 marks on July 29; it had risen to 500,000 September 9; in November it crossed the billion mark. With the issue of a supposed gold currency the Tageblatt began printing prices in both gold and paper marks. The contrast is ghastly. On November 18 the price reads: 20 gold pfennigs, or 120 billion marks. One pre-war metal mark was equivalent to 600 billion marks of the kind men receive as wages.

WE are glad to see that Mr. Coolidge is going to enter the Illinois and California primaries. That is the democratic way of testing out public sentiment and ascertaining whether the Republican masses favor his continuance in office or not. Indeed, we hope he will go still further, openly announce his own candidacy, and have himself enrolled as a candidate in every State which is advanced enough to test the sentiment of the voters by means of a primary. That does not, of course, mean that we shall thereby escape the customary procedure of having a Republican nominee picked by bosses in a room in the most exclusive hotel of the city in which the convention is held. But at least, if most primaries should reject Mr. Coolidge, the leaders could not be in doubt as to his chances at the election. Senator Johnson, too, is at work and will likewise confront the acid test of the primaries. On the Democratic side, only Mr. McAdoo seems to be making any headway. He might easily sweep the country if he would come out for government ownership of railroads and against the League of Nations, but he is hedging and, like all politicians, wondering whether it would be expedient or not.

NOTHING spreads like a bad example. Judge Mayer decides that the administration of justice has been imperiled by criticism from Comptroller Craig, and immediately Justice Hagerty of the New York Supreme Court conceives that the majesty of the law is undermined by the remarks of an assistant corporation counsel. The justice declares that a slur has been cast upon the entire Supreme Court of the State, and demands an apology. The criticism was in a newspaper interview to the effect that makers of gambling slot machines could, with political influence and high-priced counsel, obtain injunctions preventing police interference. The remarks were made without adequate evidence, and the assistant corporation counsel subsequently wrote to Justice Hagerty that they were inaccurate. This was not enough; the dignity of the bench must be upheld by an apology. What tommyrot! Most people had never heard of this slur on the courts until Justice Hagerty brought it to their attention. Congress and the President have been subjected to pitiless and constant criticism since this republic was founded; yet our legislative and executive branches are functioning with ever-increasing power and authority. Is it not possible that our courts, too, can carry on without suppressing free speech on the part of persons who dispute, however rightly or wrongly, the unblemished record of the bench for justice?

WHILE meditating on Judge Mayer and Justice Hagerty, who seem to think that the way to uphold the majesty of the law is to make it ridiculous, our eye caught an item in the Seattle Union Record, which told how a farmer was faced with hanging or deportation (minus his ears) because he had taken one of his cows out of the public pound and led her home against the protest of the custodian of the inclosure. A charge of "pound breach" was laid against him and he was found guilty. But when the judge searched for a law under which to sentence the farmer, it was found that the criminal code of the State of Washington failed to provide for the offense. Resort was then had to the English common law, and an ancient act was discovered which provided that a person guilty of "pound breach" might be either executed or exiled to a penal colony in Australia after having his ears cut off. The edition of the Union Record which we were reading went to press before the judge had decided which penalty to apply, but the story should be an inspiration to Judge Mayer and Justice Hagerty. Were they to crop the ears or hang a ring in the nose of anybody who criticized the courts, the waning prestige of our judicial system might be restored.

WE owe the New York Times an apology. In commenting on Judge Parker's defense of the "capitalist press" we stated that the Times had omitted Senator Wheeler's reply to Judge Parker while printing the judge's attack upon Senator Wheeler. We were mistaken. The fact that the Times's own index department informed us that it had not printed Senator Wheeler's reply does not obviate the error. It had printed a fair extract from Senator Wheeler's letter, which, while under a less conspicuous head, was longer than its extract from the attack upon him. We make the correction herewith, and we are glad to give the correction the same position we gave the original charge.

IN spite of the ease with which our last tariff bill went through Congress, there are signs that the business community is no longer as solid for this particular kind of boneheadedness as it was once. Take the bankers, for instance. The Chase National Bank of New York City has issued a bulletin by its economist, Benjamin M. Anderson, Jr., who calls attention to changed economic conditions which are leading bankers to view our tariff wall with a doubt that they did not feel previous to the World War.

> They have seen, for a period of nine years, an excess of exports going out, unmatched by imports, unmatched even by the so-called "invisible" items of immigrants' remittances, shipping services, and the like. They have seen, consequently, the piling up of an ever-growing debt of foreign countries to the United States, not primarily to banks, but rather to investors, exporters, foreign-exchange speculators, etc. . . . They have studied anxiously the problem of how Europe could ever pay her debt, and it has become increasingly clear to them that she can pay it only if she is allowed to send goods here, sell the goods in our markets, and turn over the proceeds in dollars to her creditors here. It is increasingly clear that the present excessive tariff rates constitute a hurdle so high that Europe would have the gravest difficulty in making large payments here, even if she were otherwise in a position to undertake it.

MEANWHILE two billion dollars in gold has flowed into the country in the past nine years, draining Europe's liquid assets. And this great gilded heap, which some of us regard as such a bulwark of wealth and strength—are the bankers equally enthusiastic about it? The answer, according to Mr. Anderson, is in the negative. This gilded heap is a vast "dead asset," both wasteful and dangerous.

> Gold is a tool of trade. It is an expensive tool. Gold bears no interest. When it is accumulated in excess of the need, it involves a waste of capital. The United States would be very much better off today, for example, if we had a billion and a half dollars less of gold in the country and instead had a billion and a half dollars more of housing facilities in our congested cities. The United States would also be better off if the countries of Europe had a billion and a half dollars of our gold as a basis for the restoration of sound currency and liquid credit position.

These words are as significant as true. If the bankers ever decide to present a united front against a protective tariff, then the historic tenet of the G.O.P. is doomed.

POLITICS in France have a dash and verve utterly foreign to our own. Lucien Midol, leader of the railway strike of 1920, was recently elected by the Communists to the municipal council of Paris. After the strike he had taken refuge in Switzerland, and the French courts, as is their wont, condemned him in absentia for a great variety of crimes. Upon his election Midol crossed the Franco-Swiss frontier on foot, took local trains to a suburb of Paris, and walked into the capital with the morning flood of wage-earners. On the appointed day the police set up a barrage about the Town Hall, but Midol slipped through unrecognized, took his seat, and made a speech. After the session all the deputies entered the chairman's office. The police demanded entry. Ferdinand Brunet, far from a Communist but evidently with a touch of humor, stood at the locked door with the key in his pocket and informed the police that they had no right to enter his office. The police sent for a locksmith. The lock was picked and the police rushed in. "Too late," said one of the councilors. So the police rushed out, while Midol, sitting at Brunet's desk, laughed with the rest. He then joined, unrecognized, the reporters and listened to a police officer describe how he had escaped from the window. The next day, while the police searched every automobile and pedestrian crossing the French frontier, Midol had himself photographed in Paris. A second time Midol passed the police barrage and entered the City Hall, but this time a police officer discovered him in the cloakroom.

A HUNDRED years ago a small leaflet circulated in Manchester, England, which aimed to relieve the economic burden of excessively large families by giving the parents contraceptive information, was labeled by the good people "The Diabolical Handbill." Seven years ago, fifty-five years after the first birth-control clinic in the world was opened in Amsterdam, the police arrested Margaret Sanger and two others for opening such a clinic in Brooklyn. The tide has scarcely turned yet. But the advocates of birth control have now a fund of practical data with which to wage a fight that is more fundamental that all the maternity and child-welfare legislation in the world. For eleven months the New York Clinical Research Bureau has conducted a scientific study of 900 cases—the first socio-medical research in birth control that has ever been done. For every case studied, two were rejected because they did not fall within the legal classification of those who may be so aided. All who received information at the clinic had to show that it was needed as a measure of health; 73 per cent sought it as well for economic reasons; 49 per cent showed bad family inheritance. The United States stands sixth on the child mortality list; in the five countries ahead of us there is no legal restriction on the dissemination of birth-control information. The United States is twentieth on the list in maternal mortality. We must get rid of cant in dealing with a subject of this kind or else forever class ourselves with those who used to condemn lightning-rods as an interference with divine providence.

"A YEAR and a day"—the old fairy tales always hung upon that glamorous phrase. Likewise, too often, the modern fairy tale of justice and political freedom. "A year and a day," said His Honor, Judge Henry W. Goddard, leaning down from his bench in the United States District Court in New York City, as he sentenced Carlo Tresca to the federal penitentiary at Atlanta for carrying in his paper, Il Martello, the two-line advertisement of a book on birth control. As The Nation pointed out last week, the authorities are not concerned about the book. It was not in the hope of catching an insignificant advertisement that a special agent of the Department of Justice hired himself out to Il Martello for a year. But that he was unable in that time to find better cause for arresting Mr. Tresca makes the present charge and conviction all the more disgusting. District Attorney Mattucks's admission that the whole investigation was made at the instigation of the Italian ambassador, and his suggestion that if Mr. Tresca would leave the country at once sentence should be suspended, are significant. Time was when Americans would have vigorously resented the dictation of a foreign Power in American courts.

KINDNESS is a real impulse of the human heart, we believe, and not a mere outcropping of the idea of duty or a seasonal, Santa Claus sort of benevolence. But how tragically easy it is to choke the springs of kindness with a clod of prejudice or a hard, indecent lie. We have recently received a communication from Paxton Hibben of the American Nansen Committee, which quite persuades us that the press associations, with various superheated patriots and officials as accomplices, are unwitting murderers of Russian children. He sends us a letter from a man who last year collected $1,200 worth of clothing for the orphans of Russia. This year he will do nothing to help these children—he has been told that the Russians are selling grain and with the proceeds importing paper on which to spread the doctrines of communism, that a huge and unnecessary standing army is being maintained, that "unlimited funds" are being sent from Russia into the United States "to stir up labor strife with the ultimate view of the overthrow of our democratic form of government." He admits that the children are not to blame but fears that Americans must be rather indifferent to their sufferings until the "majority in Russia . . . some day come to their own, assert their rights and powers, and oust this bunch of robbers and murderers. . . ." Such has been the food fed to the American public. The Russian Government may list its chief imports, and repeat its offers for the recognition and the settlement of the Czar's debts, and show how its army compares with the other armies of Europe. And the scandalous misrepresentations bought and published by the United Mine Workers may be shown up in every decent journal. None the less official lies and unofficial slander carry farther than these denials—to the end that Russian children are left by kind and honest Americans to die.

JOHN MORLEY was a stalwart old stoic, and one respects the stern dictates of his will. But has any man the right to lay down such terms as these:

> As it is possible that some person may desire to write a memoir of my life, which I regard as wholly superfluous, I enjoin upon my executors and each of them to refuse to aid or encourage any such design, and not allow any such person to have access to any of my papers, whether personal or acquired in the course of official duty, either for perusal or otherwise. And I also desire that the same refusal of access to my papers shall be extended to persons writing memoirs or biographies of friends of mine or others.

There has, perhaps, been an exaggerated mania for memoirs in these latter years, but the least valuable of them have been published by their living writers. If John Morley had desired that a decade should elapse and personal impressions fade before his story were written, that would be, possibly, a justifiable request; but to bar the future from attempting to understand the past through the papers of such a man as Morley—that seems to us a dead hand set against the right of history. A more sympathetic side of Morley's character is revealed in his bequest of "a substantial contribution from my library, not to be less than 5,000 volumes, to be chosen by the chairman of the [Manchester] University Council in priority to any other beneficiary, such volumes to be placed in Ashburne Hall for the benefit of the women students."

THE fruits of last year's convention on church publicity are being gathered. At that convention the chairman of the church-advertising department of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World described the need for broadcasting Christianity in the following terms:

> This is the greatest field yet unentered by the advertising fraternity. . . . The advertising men with their genius and ability to spread truth must take an interest in the church and put it into the minds and hearts of men. If they do not do so, they will show the first evidence of narrowness and selfishness yet shown by the wonderful profession when a new door opens. . . . The plain duty of the advertising man is to "join the church and become a vital part of the organization" . . . for when the church prospers, all other business prospers. . . . The people are hungry for God, but they must sometimes have quail mixed with their manna.

Now the seed which fell upon the good ground has sprung up a hundred-fold. Churches are advertising as never before. The Editor and Publisher proudly reports that the Brooklyn Eagle ran "the largest single piece of church advertising copy ever printed in a daily newspaper"—a double-spread on the occasion of the fall meeting of the Methodist Board of Bishops. A manufacturer a few doors from The Nation's office offers "Interchangeable Signs for Church and Commercial Advertising." "I've put Jesus in my balance sheet, boys," says the Y. M. C. A. orator in "Bunk," "and I find he shows a net profit year after year." But "Bunk" is only a novel.

Labor's Triumph in England

Of profound significance to the whole world is the outcome of the British elections. It is one of those events which like a sudden flash of lightning illumine the darkest skies with a radiant promise of the morrow. To liberals and progressives everywhere the gains of the Labor Party, utterly unexpected in their magnitude, must bring fresh hope and encouragement. Fighting against all sorts of odds, with their treasury exhausted, with cries of "socialism" and "beware the capital levy" being used against them everywhere by the united forces of wealth, privilege, and conservatism, the Labor Party appears to have won forty-seven additional seats where thirty was the highest number the most enthusiastic had dared to prophesy. More than that, they won in districts in London where it was not believed that they had any chance whatever. Their policy of refusing to amalgamate with the Liberals was triumphantly vindicated. The Liberals, despite the Asquith and Lloyd George reunion, won forty seats less than the Labor Party, which remains His Majesty's Opposition.

Rarely has political folly met with so prompt and deserved a punishment as that which has overtaken the Baldwin Government. Planless, cowardly, and utterly inconsistent in their foreign policy, incredibly shortsighted and mistaken in their appeal to the country on a false domestic issue, the Conservatives have been fairly overwhelmed. They have paid the price for intrusting their fortunes to a sincere but dull and superficial business man, and for undertaking to overthrow in a three weeks' campaign that historic British policy of free trade to which Britain owes its prestige and power and for decades owed its industrial domination of the globe. It is precisely this triumph of free trade as well as the progress of the Labor Party which makes this election so momentous for the whole world. Never was there a greater need for the one conspicuous free-trade nation to nail its colors to the mast. When all Europe condemns itself to needless losses and hardships because of the endless new frontiers and vicious new tariffs which are the aftermath of the war, so shining an example of sound economic policy could have been lost only with the utmost detriment to mankind. The free-trade victory is, we believe, decisive. Elections may follow one after another in England—it looks as if they would—but we cannot believe that any other statesman will be found for a long time to come willing to test his fortunes on this issue—certainly not without long preparation. To Mr. Baldwin the hour seemed particularly tempting because of the unrest and huge unemployment. Would the voters not jump at the chance to stimulate employment by artificial barriers? Plainly he had thought nothing through. The very fact that, taking his proposals at their alleged value, they would only revive industries employing 140,000 men, when there are nearly 1,500,000 unemployed, made his case hopeless with all thinking voters. Surely we shall not again see an approach to protection from that angle, whatever else the future may hold in store.

The result of Mr. Baldwin's political incapacity and total misconception of the desires of the electorate has resulted in a situation which, as has been widely pointed out, subjects the British constitution to its severest test of modern times. A system of government developed by and for the two-party system and presupposing a majority after every election is now confronted with the fact of three great parties none of which is able to control the House. It would be idle to prophesy the outcome of a tangle which is almost without precedent, indeed is without an exact precedent. It would be rash for the Labor Party to take office when it holds but 190 out of 615 seats. Fortunately its leader, Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, who so readily sacrificed what seemed to be his entire political future in 1914 by his opposition to the war and his steadfast adherence to his pacifist principles, is not the man to feel any personal inclination or temptation to become the first Labor premier. A minority party taking office would carry on the government only under the great handicap of knowing that its opponents by joining hands could turn it out on any measure. The very insecurity of its existence would make against efficiency and against any domestic or financial program looking to the future for its development and working out. The Labor Party would, in addition, suffer from its unquestioned need of longer parliamentary experience—we have no fear as to its ability to produce the necessary administrative talents to carry on the several departments of the government. Its membership is mixed; success has brought dangers as well as responsibilities, and some of the men who have risen from the lower ranks of Labor have much to learn and have many preconceptions and needlessly bitter class partisanship to divest themselves of. It may become a political necessity for the party to assume the management of affairs under these conditions, but it would not be likely to help it at the next election.

Yet the temptation to assume control must be very great. There is work to be done which they must itch to do. Leaders like Mr. MacDonald and Mr. Henderson, who will doubtless find a seat in the House before very long, must ache to get their hands upon the Foreign Office and to lead the way to an adjustment of the European situation without the settlement of which there is no hope of England's return to prosperity. At the same time, they must see that if they take office now their efforts to clear up the mess created and left by the governments which have followed one another since 1914 will put upon them a task so great that any failure would react upon them. Indeed, it is openly stated that the Conservatives would like to see Labor take office, believing that it could not make sufficient headway to save itself from discredit at the hands of an electorate praying for prompt and early relief from the sufferings to which it is subjected. Let no man underestimate the gravity of the British situation. We agree with Mr. Baldwin that England is quite as deserving of the sympathy of the world as is France. It is not the habit of Anglo-Saxons to exhibit their wounds like an itinerant beggar and to dwell upon their need of sympathy. But the menace of the future in England, quite aside from unemployment, is such that one can at times only wonder whether British industry can ever really recover from the shock of the war and whether an unprecedented migration is not inevitable. None the less, we hope that Labor will at least avoid the compromise of a coalition government, just as it steadfastly refused to coalesce before the poll. Let the Liberals and Conservatives combine if they will. A Ramsay MacDonald government which included Messrs. Lloyd George and Asquith would be an anomaly and would speedily become a byword.

The President and the Progressives

NEITHER the organization of Congress nor President Coolidge's two messages to it tells us much that we did not already know. Mr. Coolidge's recommendations confirm the verdict, already rendered, that he is our most conservative—not to say stand-pat—President since William McKinley. The organization of Congress shows what we have known since its election more than a year ago—that it contains an unusual percentage of progressive members but that their effectiveness will be impaired by inexperience and lack of cohesion.

Interest in Washington this winter will lie in the tug-of-war between the two forces: progressivism in Congress and reaction in the White House. Mr. Coolidge's political qualifications consist of caution, conservatism, and obedience. They were the characteristics necessary for a young Republican who sought to get ahead in Massachusetts in the days of Winthrop Murray Crane's dictatorship; they carried Mr. Coolidge into the Governor's chair, but they could not have carried him further. The rest was a streak of—for him—golden luck. And now, in his message, Mr. Coolidge naturally reverts to the only political bag of tricks he has: caution, conservatism, and obedience. To a country seething with complex problems and intolerable situations, Mr. Coolidge offers the gospel of stand-patism. He cannot do otherwise. He has nothing else to offer; and besides he realizes that his one hope of a nomination for the Presidency next summer is to offend as few persons as possible and to sit on the lid as hard as he can for the next six months. As a sitter on the lid we can think of few abler men than Calvin Coolidge. He learned long ago to stand without hitching, and he can as surely be depended upon to sit without squirming.

Naturally a continuation of the Harding policies—what were they, by the way?—will be Mr. Coolidge's chief endeavor. We shall continue our policy of drift with regard to Europe. With the exception of a favorable reference to a world court—out of deference, no doubt, to Mr. Harding's advocacy of it—Mr. Coolidge's messages contain not a single constructive recommendation in regard to foreign relations in a world of chaos. He stands with Mr. Hughes, of course, in refusing to consider cancelation of the Allied war debts to us in return for the possibility of averting an economic collapse in Europe. He would hold to an I. O. U. which (except in the case of Great Britain) there is no hope here or hereafter of collecting rather than reestablish a market for American products. In reaffirming the policy not to recognize Russia in the present conditions, Mr. Coolidge says hopefully that he sees there "encouraging evidences of returning to the ancient ways of society." Mr. Coolidge's hermetically sealed mind is revealed almost in toto in that trustful devotion to the "ancient ways of society." It is the gospel of stand-pattism in the presence of the greatest industrial experiment of modern times.

In domestic policies Mr. Coolidge deserves praise for his recommendation in favor of a constitutional amendment to end the issue of tax-exempt securities. In backing Mr. Mellon on this issue the President takes a courageous and statesmanlike stand. Among his recommendations Mr. Coolidge places first and foremost the Mellon plan for reducing taxation and spiking the soldiers' bonus. Opposition to the bonus is good conservative doctrine, but in a candidate for renomination it marks political courage. The other proposals are mainly wasteland: the tariff wall should not be attacked; all the railroads need is consolidation; agricultural prostration is dismissed with a suggestion to farmers to diversify their crops and resort to cooperation; the fuel emergency is passed over with some kind words for the inadequate recommendations of the Coal Commission.

It would be too much to expect a thrilling battle between the progressives and the President. Mr. Coolidge will not put up a great fight for anything. If there is dangerous work to be done, he will intrust it to somebody else. The progressives in Congress, on the other hand, are full of fight, but have no permanent philosophy nor even any present program upon which to unite. Interest hitherto has centered chiefly in the progressive bloc in the Senate, but as William Hard points out in his Washington letter on another page, more is likely to be heard this winter of the progressive bloc in the House, because of the solid delegation of ten from Wisconsin and the discipline and unity that is to be expected from this group. It is doubtful, of course, if the House progressives obtained any substantial advantages as a result of their much-advertised fight in connection with the speakership. The House is a clumsy and autocratic body where a new man, even of outstanding ability, has little chance; where no minority, no matter how ably led, can accomplish much. The country will only be piling up disappointment for itself if it expects much in the way of progressive legislation from the present session of Congress. There is sufficient progressive strength to present an embarrassing opposition and thus to win some compromises. But more than that is improbable. The chief hope will be in an educational campaign for the country and in the possibility of laying foundations for a broader and deeper progressive movement.

The Menace of Mexico

REDUCED to its simplest terms, the De la Huerta coup is an attempt to stab the Mexican revolution in the back and to return Mexico to the political heirs of Porfirio Diaz. His manifesto, which omits all mention of Article 27 and makes land distribution contingent on a foreign loan, is conclusive, if direct evidence were needed. General Guadalupe Sanchez, the Vera Cruz division commander who heads the revolt, has long been an evident counter-revolutionary. His insubordinate assaults upon the agrarians in Vera Cruz have augmented the unrest in that state and deeply troubled the federal Government.

Americans may wonder why De la Huerta, long an intimate associate of the Obregon regime, should now seek to destroy its three years' constructive work. For those who really know De la Huerta the answer is not difficult. He was a good interim president chiefly because he had the support of Obregon and Calles, whose policies he carried out. As Secretary of the Treasury he gradually yielded to the temptations of his office and began building a political machine. The reactionaries, native and foreign, lent him all the support that seemed expedient.

An obviously reactionary candidate would stand no chance. So the Cooperatista Party, equipped with all the revolutionary catchwords and apparently named for its members' systematic cooperation in looting the state and the municipal treasuries they controlled, sprang into being. A press campaign in the United States, in part financed by the treasury funds, stigmatized General Calles as a "red" and a "bolshevik." In Mexico, on the other hand, while secretly trafficking with all the forces of reaction, De la Huerta was trumpeting his radicalism, verbally indorsing the Calles candidacy, and declaring in the most solemn terms that under no circumstances would he compete—to do so would imperil the revolutionary conquests already made.

President Obregon, distressed by the raiding of the treasury, which was increasingly manifest in arrears of pay to public employees and in the hamstringing of the government education campaign, nevertheless desired to avoid an open breach. But his refusal to sanction the fraudulent election by which the titular Cooperatista leader, Prieto Laurens, sought to capture the governorship of San Luis Potosi, precipitated the announcement of De la Huerta's candidacy, "in response to overwhelming popular demand." When, after six weeks' campaigning, this proved to be little else than the clamor of the reactionaries and the pay-roll patriots, who included the "red" anarcho-syndicalist leaders, he chose the time-honored Mexican method, open revolt.

The real tragedy of this attempt lies in its destruction of President Obregon's valiant effort to establish a peaceful and democratic succession to the presidency. It had been his highest ambition to achieve this. For three years he has sought to avoid interference in state elections and has aimed to make them true expressions of the popular will. His plans were often thwarted, nor were his judgments infallible. Often he had to choose between injecting his authority, which he disliked to do, or acquiescing in a palpably crooked result. Often his choice lay between degrees of fraud and violence. In many cases. as recently in the state of Queretaro, he had to decide against his own friends and against those of the same political faith. Had he been a Diaz he could easily have filled every public office with revolutionaries of his own stripe and paved the way for an uncontestable presidential election.

His candidate had long been Plutarco Elias Calles, Secretary of Gobernacion, without question the one man with the popular support, the strength, and the vision to carry on the almost superhuman task that Obregon has attempted. In every sense Calles was the logical candidate. But while making no secret of his preference, the President determined that the election should be free and that no official machinery should be used to help or hinder any candidacy. Calles therefore resigned his cabinet post, as did his staunchest supporters, Gasca, governor of the federal district, Morones, head of the government munition works, and others. The federal Government did not lift a finger for Calles—the anti-Calles press in Mexico City has not been able to cite a single instance of official pressure. Nevertheless De la Huerta and his following loudly raised the cry of "imposition," and when they found no popular support themselves sought to impose their candidate by the sword.

Yet good may come out of this defection. Pseudo-revolutionists have long handicapped Obregon's efforts, and while mouthing the shibboleths of the new order have shamelessly betrayed it. Many of them have now eliminated themselves. Here and there disappointed office-seekers and grudge-holders of one sort or another may attempt to profit by the situation. But despite all the disruptive forces the revolt will fail because the plain people are for Obregon, whose government has been a sincere and determined effort against incredible odds to move toward political and social democracy.

Yet a very real menace, not only for Mexico but for the United States, exists—unfortunately beyond Obregon's power to avert. It calls for the unremitting vigilance and efforts of all decent Americans. For it is not without significance that within seventy-two hours a New York paper should editorially demand a large army, declaring: "We are not prepared today for a small war, for such an unwelcome duty as intervention in Mexico, should it be forced upon us."

The Seas of Democracy

DEMOCRACY, friends, is not born of crowds, of masses of people indiscriminately hurled together. Democracy is the result of selection, of patient, discerning choice, of slow nurture, of freedom guarded and watched over. The swarming public schools in our great cities are seldom breeding-places of democracy; from above and from below democracy is too often strained out of them—regimentation, prejudice, and punishment dominate the scene. If American children are to learn the democratic spirit, if they are to believe in their own right and the right of everyone else to grow into free and creative and individual persons, if they are to respect tolerance and difference and courage, they must find them somewhere else than at the overcrowded public schools controlled by political boards rather than by educators.

Unfortunately the places where they may learn these virtues of the free citizen are rare in the whole country. A few public schools here and there have been set apart for experimental work in education; in the smaller cities the schools are often fairly free from political domination and sometimes open to liberal educational influences; in New York there are perhaps half a dozen private schools as well which in varying degrees and in different ways are trying to utilize freedom as a training for freedom, and self-expression as an educational tool. Numerically the value of these schools is insignificant; only a handful of children can be reached by their methods. Educationally their value is beyond estimate. They are the laboratories from which the educational discoveries of the future are likely to spring.

A few of the more "regular" and conservative of these institutions are well endowed and successful. Most of them, however, and especially the more advanced among them, are forced to waste precious time and energy in the mere business of keeping alive. One of the younger and most interesting of these oases of freedom is the Walden School in New York City, which is valiantly struggling toward an endowment to maintain itself during the next four years. The City and Country School, against similar odds, is performing an equally interesting and stimulatingly different piece of work. In both schools the children are treated as the friends and companions in work of their teachers, individual preferences and talents are eagerly watched for and encouraged, individual difficulties are problems to be studied not sins to be extirpated. Differences in method are the necessary incidents of a voyage of discovery over seas where most of the charts have been found misleading and thrown overboard. Those who can help these schools have a right to feel that they are helping the Columbuses of education to explore new seas.

Germany's Political Failures

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

London, November 12

"WIR sind ein unpolitisches Volk"—"we are a non-political people"—once wrote Prince Bülow. No one can study the Germany of today and of the last five years without concurring in the Prince's verdict. The ineptness which permitted the maneuvering of Germany into a position of moral turpitude in 1914 did not cease with the birth of the German republic. The years that have passed, years of physical suffering and mental anguish such as only the Russians can understand and appreciate, have produced no dominant German statesmen or statesman, have brought forward no moral or spiritual or political leader, have consolidated public opinion not at all. On the contrary, with every month's slipping down into economic chaos and intellectual despair, the cleavages have become more marked, the differences more varied and more bitter. Under relentless and vindictive pressure from outside, it has not only been impossible to close ranks, but some of the worst passions and the worst elements in the community have come to the surface. With the enemy not only at the door but in the front hall, parlor, and kitchen and well on his way upstairs, it is impossible to present a united German front. It is easy to sing, as the crowd still does, "Deutschland über Alles," but to make the necessary sacrifices so that the enemy shall meet a Germany compact, indivisible, and unshakable—that appears impossible. Once more we see, as in so many other countries, the exploding of the old theory that each grave national crisis produces its master spirit, its Lincoln or its Cromwell, divinely prepared to deal with the hour. Germany is but one of many countries in which enlightened and able leadership is lacking.

Now I am well aware how urgent are the extenuating circumstances. Every act of the Allies since the war has been as if deliberately planned to hamstring, and then to destroy, the newly born democratic movement in Germany, the freeing of which from its autocratic mastership Woodrow Wilson declared to be one of our purposes in entering the war. It is not easy to develop self-government and self-control when you are suddenly called upon to take over a nation prostrate in the ruins of its autocratic government and to construct an entirely new system of national management under fire. You cannot so readily show what possibilities of successful self-government lie within you when you are hampered at every turn, when at least three-quarters of your most valuable assets in the way of national resources are stolen from you, when you are beset by dozens of foreign commissions, when you get nearly one hundred orders in one week as to how you, representing a presumably free and independent government in possession of full sovereignty, shall conduct your business. Nor is your situation improved by the presence of thousands upon thousands of foreign troops upon your soil, representing a clear-cut political purpose to dismember your country, to take from it additional stretches of territory. If under these circumstances you can retain any authority over your people, that is perhaps a noteworthy achievement.

Then, we ought surely to judge leniently the conduct of a people who for nine long years have been subjected to a nervous strain and a mental torture of the worst kind; who during at least four, if not five, of those years have daily faced the specter of famine; who are now reduced by foreign exactions and cruelties and by their mismanagement of their own currency to a point where their mental horizon is limited entirely by the questions where can they get food and how can they pay for it. Few people in modern times have been called upon to undergo such a trial by fire.

Yet, when every allowance is made, I must confess to bitter disappointment that the political incapacity of the German people continues and continues so gravely to their own hurt. I cannot find it easy to overlook or forgive the continuous factional disputes and intrigues in the Reichstag. It is not easy to forgive the placing in the Cuno cabinet of a totally inefficient finance minister (to speak politely of him) by the Centrum, and his retention there as the price of that party's support of the coalition when the Reich was in its gravest straits. One can understand the persistence of racial differences such as those which exist between Prussia and Bavaria. One can even understand in a way the fanatical, semi-religious devotion to country of the Bavarian militarists, monarchists, and nationalists, with the resultant belief that at this juncture there is no other method to save the fatherland except to impose their will upon the rest of Germany. But one cannot forgive the playing of petty party politics while the national house is burning, nor the insistence upon exploiting at this time the differing sectional points of view; one does feel that in such an emergency Communist, monarchist, Socialist, Bavarian, and the ultra-reactionary of every stripe ought to suspend their differences, postpone their quarrels, turn to in order to keep afloat their sinking ship, and uphold the hands of the constituted authority in the extraordinarily difficult negotiations with the false and lying Gallic enemy. What if those constituted authorities are not faithful to their tasks? Why, then the united pressure of the masses could and should make itself felt; at worst, the hour of accounting and reckoning would have to be postponed.

As for the ministries that have existed in Germany since the revolution of 1918, have they been true to themselves, their people, and their obligations? I have the strongest feeling that they have not. Too often there has been a lack of straightforwardness, and that still exists. When Stresemann sent his ultimatum to Bavaria at the end of October he suppressed the most important part of it from his own people. With disgusting indirection he simultaneously struck at the Bavarians over the heads of the Saxons, pulling down the government of the latter because he had had "seventeen complaints of the ill-treatment of Saxon industrialists by Communist workers." Stresemann did these things for expediency's sake and for tactical reasons. Suppression of truth is a dangerous game to play in most countries, and one may be certain that if the German people discover how the actual facts have been withheld from them those guilty will have to pay a heavy price.

But perhaps the clearest instance of the way the successive German governments have failed to keep faith with their own people appears when one remembers the solemn promises given in 1919 that immediate steps would be taken to socialize the great industries. "Die Sozialisierung ist da!" read great posters on all the blank walls and public buildings when I reached Berlin during the Spartacist uprising in March of that year. It was held to be the most potent and magic formula with which to calm the revolters. But nothing whatever has since been done. The mines were to be the first to be nationalized; they are still in private hands. Now, nationalization may or may not be a wise policy, but that the majority of the German people wanted it in 1919 can hardly be doubted. It was beyond dispute solemnly promised to them. What wonder if the authority of the government has failed with the masses? It has perhaps been a fortunate thing for the successive chancellors that the German people have become hourly more and more concerned about their daily bread and less and less able to concentrate upon their politics and to compare promise with performance.

As for the political ineptness of the controllers of Germany's Government, the instances of that are legion. I repeatedly asked in Berlin why the simple device of appointing an advisory finance commission of foreigners to cooperate with the German Government and to advise it in the matter of payments to the Allied governments was not adopted. Supposing a commission comprising Sir George Paish, John Maynard Keynes, Frank A. Vanderlip, Paul Warburg, a Swiss, a Dutch, and a Scandinavian financier had been appointed, and the German Government had laid all its cards on the table and been guided by the commission's advice, what a safeguard against foreign insinuation and misrepresentation that would have constituted! What a means with which to meet the demands of the Reparation Commission! The word and opinion of such men must have been accepted by the financial and commercial world as conclusive. Yet no one in Berlin appears ever to have thought of such a simple stratagem. If such a commission had certified to the honorable efforts of the Germans to pay, approved the amounts of their payments and their capacity for future deliveries, not even M. Poincaré would have dared to dispute the decisions. Instead, the Germans blundered on, producing abroad the widespread belief that they were seeking to avoid their just debts, amazing their friends when they gave Poincaré the opportunity to enter the Ruhr because of inexcusable minor defaults, and never making one clear-cut reparations offer and sticking to it through thick and thin.

Such a body of experts would moreover have aided in the handling of the German currency situation. The French have reason to say that part of the responsibility for the German financial collapse rests on Berlin because of its failure to deal properly and promptly with the currency problem. In another article I have pointed out how victory through passive resistance was thrown away because of the failure to plan for its adequate financing—another case where, whether through stupidity or shortsightedness or otherwise, the Germans were misled by those in authority. There persists a general suspicion that in some of the helter-skelter stabilizing efforts to peg the mark at this or the other figure the insiders enriched themselves. Indeed, it is rather openly charged that labor unions and some political parties have financed themselves by gambling in exchange. It is impossible to get a satisfactory answer to the question why, if it was a good thing to establish a new and sound currency on November 1 last, it would not have been a good thing to do it on February 1 last. Finally, as to the general financial situation, there is today still no adequate governmental appreciation of its desperate character or even of the exact nature of the disease. What political incapacity that spells when Germany is dying from this disease, induced and superinduced by outside pressure and malignance! There are competent experts in Germany like Dr. R. R. Kuczynski; they do not appear to be consulted. It is not too late now to call in foreign experts, but the Berlin vision is probably still not broad enough for that. I do not believe for one instant that Berlin has been deliberately dishonest as to reparations, or in the debasement of its currency; but one must admit that their political ineptness has on occasion presented matters to the world as if they were.

Again one does not feel that one is entirely unjust in believing that a resolute government would have grappled with the disorderly elements, the profiteers, the gamblers in the necessities of life, who inevitably rise to the top when there is such a complete stirring up of all the forces that constitute national life. There are base men in every country, tax evaders, men who cheat their government and enrich themselves cold-bloodedly at the expense of the unfortunate among their fellow-countrymen. But a government filled with righteous determination to combat the wrong and having some political flair would have found means of checking the excesses which Germany has witnessed along these lines—happenings that have given rise to the suspicion abroad that the Government itself has connived at a flight of capital out of the country to avoid the payment of just debts. This impression has been widely circulated by the Allies, but it is not warranted by the facts, especially when it is recalled that the German Government has repeatedly and in vain called upon the Allies and the neutral nations to compel their banks to reveal the deposits made by Germans in those institutions and countries so that it might tax them.

Again, there are the German industrialists. Today they constitute a coordinate government within the German empire. Instead of aiding Berlin to grapple with them, France has done everything it could to exalt the industrialists at the expense of Berlin by dealing directly with them, which has of course destroyed Berlin's authority over them and has encouraged them to make use of the distress of their country and the approaching starvation of the masses of their workmen, to attempt to do away with the eight-hour day and otherwise to improve their position as against that of their employees who have nothing left but to submit. During the war, according to report, these large industries were practically taken over by the Government; there certainly seems no reason why in this even greater national emergency a similar policy could not have been pursued. The fact, I fear, is that the Cuno and Stresemann governments have been governments by and for business men rather than for the whole German people.

So one leaves Germany today with a sinking heart over its political incapacity. Any people plunged into democracy so suddenly would have had reason to ask for indulgence even had there been no foreign complications. Germany was particularly handicapped. It had a huge defeated army of 6,000,000 men to demobilize while changing from monarchy to republic. It has clearly had to pay for its whole autocratic tradition and policies under which men were often excluded from administrative careers if they did not belong to certain charmed circles. It has had to pay for the whole Bismarckian policy of stifling liberalism and punishing socialists for their opinions—did he not say that he would "squeeze them against the wall until they squeaked"? It is suffering now because of generations of autocracy whose whole tendency was to make men leave everything which has to do with government and administration to the bureaucracy and thus to deprive themselves of experience in the affairs of state. Yet when all is said and done, the disappointment is there that the record of the last five years is what it is; that so proud, so self-confident, so conceited a people, so certain of their powers and their mission in the world, have made such a poor showing; that they have not even dealt adequately with their own war criminals; that they are still without the insight to understand the psychology and the points of view of other peoples; that they are not even able to convince the world of their own honesty of purpose; that they are without spiritual unity and concord; that they are cracking under pressure, albeit a wicked pressure, diabolically planned not only to destroy their country but also to destroy their reputation for integrity and their character by compelling them at the pistol's point to agree to do the impossible.

What does one see before Germany? Well, if any man of ordinarily humane and Christian instincts should let his mind dwell on what may happen in the next few months if England and America continue to flinch and to fail, he would not be able to sleep o' nights—that is if he had seen the situation at first hand in the Ruhr and elsewhere. One of the most terrible catastrophes in the history of mankind is under way. What if that could be staved off? Well, even if the French could overnight be remanded to sanity, charity, and ordinary human decency, the Germans would still have before them the Slough of Despond. They will, I fear, have to go down far in suffering, misery, and disaster. It looks now as if they would have to take their dose of a dictatorship of the right and a dictatorship of the proletariat. It looks as if there must needs be years of convulsion, disorder, and civil strife before the new birth comes—a new birth which could have been brought about so easily had the good intentions and the financial ability of the Germans in 1919 been met by Christian fellowship and good-will on the part of the Allies.

The responsibility for the deaths of millions of Europeans rests in large measure with the rulers of Austria and Germany in 1914. The responsibility in this hour for the impending death by slow starvation of millions of German men, women, and children will rest in first line upon the French. Upon their heads will be the blood of the innocent. For that blood they will yet pay a terrible price unless all history is a lie.

These United States—XLIII*

WASHINGTON: The Dawn of a Tomorrow

By ROBERT WHITAKER

MY predecessor in the pastorate at Seattle thirty-five years ago, a typical Titan of the frontier, was never weary of demonstrating that the Puget Sound country is not the Northwest corner of the United States. Seattle, he insisted, is considerably nearer New York City on the east than to the farthest extension of Alaska on the west. Washington State is the doorway, and the only doorway to more than one-sixth of the total continental area of the United States.

One can hardly say of Alaska now what might have been said truthfully thirty-five years ago, it hasn't been scratched yet. It has been scratched, and with wonderful results. What those results have been in Alaska and in the world at large does not concern us here. What they were for the State of Washington would take many paragraphs to tell. It is enough to say that Washington's hour of greatest advance followed hard upon the golden dawn of Alaska's Klondike discovery. It was but a dawn, with a bit of dull gray morning following. But the day of Alaska has yet to come, and that day must mean more to Washington than any flurry of such ephemeral prosperity as a gold rush brings.

The doorway to Alaska, and to all the coast of North America which lies between Puget Sound and Alaska, that is the State of Washington. What is of more consequence to Washington's future is that Puget Sound is the doorway to Asia as well. Asia, indeed, confronts our whole West Coast. But it is characteristic of the land mass on both sides of the Pacific that the shores approach each other toward the north, and recede rapidly from each other on the south. This, with the shorter arc of earth curvature as one goes northward brings the ports on Puget Sound several days' sailing nearer those of China and Japan than are the ports of California. The volume of commerce which passes now from Puget Sound to the Orient is many times in excess of that of all our harbors which lie farther south combined.

It was Theodore Roosevelt who said, with dramatic conciseness: "The Mediterranean Era died with the discovery of America; the Atlantic Era has reached the height of its development; the Pacific Era, destined to be the greatest, is just at its dawn." One need not agree with the negative phases of this epitome of world history to appreciate the promise of the Pacific. And Puget Sound is the most remarkable of its inland seas. In area and contour, accessibility and security at all seasons of the year, scenic variety and beauty, in the healthfulness and invigorating quality of its climate, and the wealth of sea food to be found in it and adjacent to it Puget Sound will bear comparison with any inland sea on the earth. It is no idle dream that its shores will some day be the dwelling-place of many millions of people.

The State of Washington might claim much of promise from the world carriers of tomorrow if it had no wealth of its own to offer. But of such wealth, present and prospective, there is no lack. Consider what we may call primeval wealth, that which was there before man ever saw the land, the treasure of the great woods and the treasure of the great waters. There is no need to conjecture what only yesterday were those primitive conditions, nor to waste tears on man's extravagant misuse of the resources he found. Sickening as is the desolation of the forests where immediate profit has dominated the white man's devastation of them, the area of Washington State still exhibits a wealth of standing timber which cannot be stated in terms easily grasped. Half the timber of the United States today is on the slopes of the Cascades, the Coast Range, and the Olympics of Oregon and Washington, the Bitterroots and Rockies of Idaho, Montana, and Wyoming. Washington itself is exceeded only by Oregon in its share of this vast bounty of nature, and today leads all other States in lumber production. Five and a half billion board feet of lumber a year are the product of her three hundred logging camps and eight hundred sawmills. Four hundred thousand houses a year in the United States have but a few months previous been standing timber in Washington.

Fishing in the Pacific Northwest is an industry with an output of eighty-five million dollars a year. The business exceeds that of the east coast of the British Islands and New England combined. Washington handles not only her own great product, but the vast volume of fish which comes down from the north. This wealth of wood and water, which man did nothing to create until very recently and which he has most miserably failed to conserve, would in and of itself give Washington a considerable place in the commerce of the world.

But there is the potential wealth of the State to be considered, in particular the magic "white coal," which is to transform the earth, is transforming it today. One thinks of Niagara naturally with the mention of hydro-electric power. The potential capacity of the Niagara Basin is said to be six million horse-power. The Colorado Basin surpasses this expectancy by a million horse-power. On the authority of Eastern experts the potential hydro-electric power of the Columbia River Basin, which lies largely within Washington, is twenty-one million horse-power.

And besides this primeval and potential endowment lavished on the land there is what we may call the provisional wealth, the grains, live stock, and fruits upon which man has so learned to depend. You may travel for hundreds of miles within the State far from the haunts of the salmon, throughout what is fittingly known as The Inland Empire, where the all but treeless land is an ocean of billowy grain at harvest time. Even the eye accustomed to the vast wheat fields of the Mississippi Valley marvels at the illimitable vista of soft-hued grain. The dairying interests are especially favored over large areas of the State by a rainfall that does not fail them in summer. Poultry raising prospers peculiarly in that climate and is carried on with a scientific efficiency and success second to that of no other portion of the land. Washington is the greatest apple-raising section of the earth, is made for berries as naturally as its streams are made for fish, and under right economic conditions could produce fruit enough to feed a continent.

A healthful climate is everywhere recognized today as a prime factor in the building up of a country's population. So also we are beginning to understand the value of scenic beauty. Let another free from the habitant's bias speak of what Washington offers the seeker after health and natural loveliness. In "The Conquest of Consumption," Dr. Woods Hutchinson writes:

> When once we cross the summit of the Cascades we enter a totally different climate, an air which is mild, gentle, and moist, but never depressing; a country of green mountains, dazzling snow-tipped peaks, of grass, of moss and fern, which knows neither the barrenness of winter nor the brownness of summer, a land which has all the best and most invigorating qualities of the cradle of our Teutonic race, with none of its extremes. From one end to the other it is the land of tall trees and tall men, of the apple, the peach, the prune, and the pine; the land of the green valley and the rushing river. The rosy pink of its orchards every spring is equaled only by the sunset glow upon its peaks of eternal snow. It is the charmed land of the American continent, where a temperate sun, a mild climate, and a fertile soil give man the stimulus of the green and rain-swept North, with the luxurious returns for moderate effort of the teeming tropics. . . . If you have never seen Oregon, Washington, or British Columbia in summer, you lack important qualifications for imagining what the climate of heaven may be like.

That world traveler and generous commentator on America, the late Viscount Bryce, has written:

> Neither Europe nor Asia nor South America has a prospect in which sea and woods and snow mountains are so united in a landscape as in the view from Puget Sound of the great peaks that rise like white towers above the dark green forests of the Cascades.

If these testimonies seem to stress unduly the region of Puget Sound it is not for lack of loveliness to praise in other sections of the State. For mingled grandeur and beauty I have seen nothing on the Pacific Coast which surpasses the view one gets under favorable conditions in going up the canyon of the Columbia River, from the fords fifty miles below Wenatchee to the hills and gorges north of that city. The somber severity of the lower canyon, with its bald, massive cliffs all but bare of vegetation, is in striking contrast with the wealth of apple orchards and vine-clad hillsides where the valley broadens at the confluence of the Wenatchee with the greater Columbia. The mountains are there also, towering to greater heights by far, with their sharply silhouetted crests melting into the sunset skies till lost in a golden haze where cloud and crest are indistinguishable. And there are other sections and scenes a plenty of which one might write with no less enthusiasm.

Yet with all this Washington State is neither truly prosperous nor contented. In common with all the agricultural States Washington is hard hit at present by the general paralysis of the producers' markets. It avails Washington little that her grain yield is so generous when the price for grain is so inadequate. She fares better perhaps with her live-stock and subsidiary interests, but the same general condition prevails. Her precedence as the foremost apple-producing section of the world is but a mockery to the men who ship great cargoes of the finest fruit to the market, only to find themselves actually out of pocket when the freight charges are paid. Her very plenty is her poverty when that plenty lies rotting upon the ground because it is the day of the profiteer and the parasite in America just now instead of the day of the producer.

Likewise the very magnitude of her potential wealth, her undeveloped water-power, makes for her difficulty in realizing upon it. If it were less, the private corporation might be sufficient for it, or the State itself might assume the burden of bringing the water to the magic wheels. But so vast is the undertaking that we shall have learned a much larger measure of cooperation than anything we have yet realized before the stupendous task is done. Washington's history shows an unusual degree of devotion to the cooperative ideal. Her experiments have been many on this line, and the spirit of solidarity has wrought to more effect there in the Northwest than most of the people can either believe or understand. The things which have been reckoned her calamity and disgrace are really large with promise. But meanwhile there are vast areas of desolation where there should be enjoyment and fruitfulness because in common with all America Washington waits for the practical values of brotherhood among the masses of mankind to make themselves understood.

Within half a dozen years Washington State has seen two massacres in connection with her lumber industry. Amid the eternal grandeur of the snow-clad giants the spruces stand, tall, cool, and silent. But the tension of the fevered pigmies at their feet is ever at the fighting-point.

Seven men were shot to death on a beautiful Sunday morning in November, 1916, when a company of two hundred and fifty I.W.W. went from Seattle to Everett to the help of their comrades who were waging a free-speech fight there. It is possible that the fatalities were more, some bodies being swept overboard from the ship Verona in the terrible fusillade which was directed against it by those who had said that the workers should not land. Many others were sorely wounded. High-handed measures had been used against the workers for months, and barbarities endured by them which were provocative to the last degree. The men who represented property there and who were responsible for the unlawful interference with the right of the workers and their comrades to land were not officially molested for the part they had in the massacre. On the other hand the workers, who had suffered by far the heavier mortality and the more serious injuries, were swept wholesale into jail and every effort was made to hold them there for life, or hang them as the aggressors in the affair. The trial, carried on at length in Seattle with the financial backing of the lumber interests against the accused, resulted in the complete acquittal of the workers.

In Centralia on Armistice Day in 1919 there was likewise loss of life on both sides, and if the heavier loss on this occasion fell upon the champions of law and order they made the balance more than even in the unspeakable barbarity of their vengeance following. This time a conviction was secured of part of the workers placed under arrest, the arrests being again altogether from the ranks of the workers. The judge who tried the case had already made public oration against the workers. The evidence to prove prior conspiracy upon the part of the accusers he ruled out of court. Soldiers surrounded the courtroom and paraded their uniforms before the jurors. Intimidation was there to the fullest possible measure short of open violence or formal demand for a verdict of guilty on the part of an armed force. Nevertheless only a part of those under trial were condemned, the verdict, second-degree murder, being absurdly inconsistent with the circumstances of the massacre if the accused or their comrades were the aggressors. Even this compromise verdict was accompanied by an appeal from the jury to the judge for clemency, and since that time no less than five of the twelve jurors have made open affidavit that the verdict was not according to the evidence but was wrung from the jury through fear. Add to this that an extra-legal jury composed of representative labor men sent there by conservative labor bodies unanimously acquitted all the accused in their verdict. Four years later the men who are serving terms at Walla Walla, their requests for a new trial refused without show of reason or right, may think themselves forgotten, but their fate is a constant fertilizer of the ever-thickening growth of labor solidarity.

One need not resort to labor pamphlets to discover what the deeper rootage of this labor solidarity is. Here is a passage from an eminently respectable and conservative journal of California, Sunset magazine, under date of February, 1917:

> Shingle-weaving is not a trade, it is a battle. For ten hours a day the sawyer faces two teethed steel disks whirling around two hundred times a minute. To the one on the left he feeds the heavy blocks of cedar, reaching over with his left hand to remove the heavy shingles it rips off. . . . Hour after hour the shingle-weaver's hands and arms, plain, unarmored flesh and blood, are staked against the screeching steel that cares not what it severs. Hour after hour the steel sings its crescendo note as it bites into the wood, the sawdust thickens, the wet sponge under the sawyer's nose fills with fine particles. If "cedar asthma," the shingle-weaver's occupational disease, does not get him, the steel will. Sooner or later he reaches over a little too far, the whirling blade tosses drops of deep red into the air, a finger, a hand, or part of an arm comes sliding down the slick chute.

To this vivid presentation of the price at which the lumber profits in Washington have been made should be added at least mention of the revolting, body- and soul-destroying conditions which prevailed in the lumber camps till the I.W.W. forced some decency there. Out of such travail was born the militant solidarity of the shingle-weavers' union and later the compact and effective resistance of the Washington I.W.W.

It was a new-found sense of union that brought about that surprising coordination of the working forces of Seattle which produced what is still known as the Seattle Revolution. A "revolution" in the sense of intending any bodily harm to anybody it was not. The actual conduct of it was as orderly as a Quaker Quarterly Meeting. It was revolutionary only in the sense that it revealed to a startled public, including the workers themselves, the unrealized dependence of a modern community upon the least and poorest of the workers, and showed what the economic power of the workers means once they move and act with a common purpose.

The origin of the Seattle general strike at the beginning of 1919, otherwise described as the Seattle Revolution, was simple enough. Workers' solidarity had been necessary during the period of the war, had been profitable to the employers, and had been encouraged by them. Consequently the labor unions grew extraordinarily in numbers and power. Then came the cessation of hostilities, the beginnings of "retrenchment" with the "deflation" of the wages of the shipyard workers, the interference of red tape at Washington, D. C., which it is claimed stalled successful settlement of the matter in Seattle, and then the walkout of the workers of the city in common protest. The like of it had never happened in America before, and is not likely to happen again soon. It was as when the son of an overbearing father learns for the first time that he can throw his father, and fears to use his new-found power until he is ready to go his own way. Seattle labor was not ready to cut loose from the capitalist organization of society, had not dreamed of it, and had not the remotest thought of challenging the State. It has no such dream today. Spirit there is in Washington labor, and unity beyond that which is common. The Northwest has been made by men who have had to stand up to nature, and therefore are not afraid to stand up to each other. More dirt has been moved in the making of Seattle itself than anywhere else on the American continent except at the Panama Canal. They know how to resist there. But resistance is not revolution. The workers of Seattle were overwhelmed with confusion at their own success, but made an orderly retreat back to their jobs.

It was the supreme opportunity of the owning and governing classes in America if they had possessed either the intelligence or public spirit to meet it. As it was they made a god of one of the cheapest demagogues who has ever disgraced the mayoralty of a great city, a man who had fawned and cringed to the workers until the logic of their own success compelled them to draw back and he could rush in and make great ado about the suppressing of a revolution which had never been. But the weakness and the disgrace of it, as the hurt of it, was more theirs, the responsible leaders of business and culture in Seattle, that they could avail themselves of such paltry subterfuge and display. If there is any possibility of understanding between labor and capital it was theirs then, and they might have done the capitalists of all America a service. Instead there were pyrotechnics in the press and on the platform, and a vengeance upon a foe which had voluntarily dispersed scared of its own strength, such vengeance as reacted quickly to the undoing of their own interests and particularly to the punishment of the small business man.

The emphatic quality of Washington State is its adaptability to the purposes of creative labor. The climate is a worker's, not an idler's climate. The land is no parasite's paradise; it is a treasure house that waits upon free, untrammeled labor to bring forth its resources. "The summer playground of the American continent" it may deserve to be. But its summer is short, and its merits are not of the few weeks only in which men rest and play, but rather of the whole working year. The dawn of a tomorrow is upon the woods and the waters, the fruit-fields and the grain-fields of Washington, a tomorrow which can only come to the great commonwealth of the Northwest with that better social order in which the workers shall enter into their own.

The Kennels of New York

By VICTOR H. LAWN

THE United States, leader in number of automobiles per capita, wealth per capita, and other things that do not matter much, continues to permit all the countries of Europe to increase their lead in essential matters of politics and economics. Particularly pertinent at this time is the housing situation. So far, the United States has the most nearly unblemished record of inactivity in the matter of housing for workingmen of any civilized country. Tax exemption in a few States, the Homestead Commission of Massachusetts, the utterly inhuman mill towns of New England and the steel and mining towns of Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Colorado, and others, and the aborted beginnings of the Emergency Fleet Corporation during the war constitute the few insignificant efforts in this country. Nowhere has there been an intelligent attempt to face the problem. Nowhere has there been a courageous assault upon the Swiss guard of Profit. Nowhere has it been made plain that good housing for the workers at a fair rent may be inconsistent with a return upon investment, and that economic security is sometimes inconsistent with profits.

It is natural, therefore, that students of the housing problem should be watching with interest the meditations and the tribulations of the Commission of Housing and Regional Planning appointed by Governor Smith of New York. This body has held hearings throughout the State, and in New York City alone the testimony filled 1,205 pages of the stenographic record, with an additional jammed portfolio of exhibits, reports, and tabulations.

Seven men and one woman are on this housing commission. It was not long before they realized not merely that there is a housing shortage today fully as acute as at any other time in the State's history, but also that this shortage is only a superficial manifestation of the tragedy of poverty on the one hand and the utter callousness of profiteers on the other. Before these two fundamental propositions this committee, without question one of the most intelligent, most responsive, most comprehending committees in the history of the State, is practically helpless.

The commission knows what it can do. It can suggest municipal and state building operations or a subsidy to private builders. It can also suggest cooperative building hedged about with legal protections for the tenant-owners. These plans were advanced during the hearings. There is no question that relief would result from either scheme, although municipal home-building is the most logical. But the commission knows equally well that the great forces of profit-makers will not for a moment consider striking their colors even to ease the stringency of a situation filled with dangers not only to the mass of people, but ultimately to themselves. During the hearings the impudent refusal of "Wall Street" to turn a hand was testified to by bankers and builders and the avarice of a group of landlord-owners was emphasized.

For the student of sociology and economics there is no better textbook, no more human document, than the record of the hearings before the commission. I had just been reading "Pelle the Conqueror," an epic of poverty in Europe, and I had consoled myself with the thought, "Well, no matter how bad things are here they are not as bad as that—besides, Pelle lived forty years ago." That comfort I no longer have. Here are a few instances picked at random from the record:

> There has been a decrease in the wages in the tobacco factories. They are paying the lowest wages in years. . . . A woman came in the other day—had a husband who was earning $20 as a cigarmaker. She is paying $40 a month rent for rooms that used to rent at $15 a few years ago. You see that is a perfectly disproportionate rent, and she has been obliged to go to work. They have two children and she wanted to leave them in our day nursery. But so many mothers are going to work now that we think a long time before we take any woman in a nursery whose husband is making more than $20 a week.

And to counterbalance this is the testimony of a real-estate operator that before the war landlords were earning about 4 per cent on their property and that now they are not content with 8 and 10 per cent.

"Pelle the Conqueror" contains vivid paragraphs describing the stenches and the primitive sanitary conditions in The Ark, a notoriously decrepit home for the very poorest in Copenhagen. The following paragraphs describe different houses in New York City in October, 1923:

> Another house on Twenty-ninth Street, a six-family house, toilet in the yard, and when the toilet is flushed they have no water in the house. They have no improvements.
> Mrs. K. lived in an apartment where the chief amusement of the two younger children was to crawl through the holes in the walls. In this house the water supply is always uncertain, and there is never enough water to flush the toilets. The woman on the top floor carried water up three flights for this purpose.

After listening to a week's testimony of this nature it seemed that every other house in New York was an Ark.

The most serious feature of the situation is the effect upon the children of living crowded into unsanitary kennels. Health commissioners and settlement workers had told of malnutrition among children, but it remained for a little East Side woman, Mrs. Edith B. Coff, to make real and vivid the conditions that exist:

> Out of about 400 children 102 were so distinctly underweight that on examination we found most of them were underweight somewhere between five and seventeen pounds. Their ages were between five and twelve years. If a child was six or seven pounds underweight we would do nothing. It was the normal size or weight for an East Side child now. . . . I found that the cause of the children's condition was the housing condition foremost. We find that the children do not sleep. The usual family consists of five or six persons. There are no doors. There is no privacy. The gas is burning until 12 or 1 o'clock, especially if there is a baby. Everyone is talking. Everyone is walking. The street is noisy and the child does not fall asleep until 12 and half-past 12 and 1.
> I have tried to go up time and again and help put a child to sleep and then I knew how little really I could expect the mother, who has three or four other children, to put that child to sleep at eight o'clock. The father sits up and smokes a cigar and talks with the neighbor and the child screams. There is no air. They sleep there, four in the back bedroom, with one window. They sleep three or four together and they are naturally restless.
> When they get up in the morning they are not able to eat their breakfast. They did not sleep. They did not have any air. They get up tired and nervous and disturbed, and when they get up they do not have their breakfast. They go to school, come home, have a little something to eat, and then the same story begins all over again.

A few hours after this testimony had been given a witness for the landlords said: "All this talk about the poor people has nothing to do with the housing situation. You've always got your poor people, high rents or low."

On the other side of the housing situation is the statement, frequently reiterated, that with the present high cost of building and the premium exacted by banks for lending mortgage money the speculative builder cannot rent for less than $15 a room and make any profit on new homes. Nor can the small homeseeker get money to build his own home in the suburbs, thus relieving the congestion and the excess demand on homes occupied by the poorer workers. Charles O'Connor Hennessy, president of the Franklin Society for Homebuilding and Savings, laid the blame for "tight money" directly to the financial institutions.

"The savings banks," he said, "do not as a rule lend a dollar to any small homeseeker for construction purposes, that is to say for the building of houses, and until very recently it was true that the savings banks of the city did not encourage applications from homeseekers upon completed houses for small loans."

Mr. Hennessy also blamed the Wall Street houses for not investing in the bonds of the Land Bank, a State institution similar to the Federal Land Bank. The Land Bank was authorized in 1915 and was the forerunner of the Federal Reserve Bank as well as of the farm loan system. It was intended that through this Land Bank funds would be made available on easy terms for homeseekers of New York State to build or to buy. It is composed of savings and loan associations with resources of $70,000,000. But first the war prevented the Land Bank from functioning properly and since 1918 the trust companies and banks have refused to buy their 5 per cent bonds. David B. Hutton, managing director of the Land Bank, told the commission he had been with his hat in his hand to the big banks and financial institutions, but they would not buy his bonds.

Faced with this situation, what does the future hold? The housing commission will, of course, recommend extension of the emergency rent laws for two years. It will recommend that the laws apply to tax-exempt houses, now outside the jurisdiction of the housing bills. It will probably recommend that tenants be given the benefit of any doubt that exists in the minds of judge or jury; that the landlord be shorn of special privileges such as eviction, and that he be limited in his redress to the same measures of equity that apply to the butcher, the baker, and other tradesmen. It will recommend minor changes and probably the abolition of the tax exemption on new buildings.

But the commission will probably go further. It is almost certain to recommend that cities be compelled to invest a certain amount of their sinking funds in the Land Bank. In this way city funds will be made available to residents for home building. This much will exhaust the program which the housing commission will hope to push through the legislature. But the commission will hardly content itself with this "immediate program." The report should and doubtless will include a suggestion for municipal housing activity on a large scale. This is the only way out. It may seem revolutionary now. But the present innocuous New York laws were denounced as "socialistic" two years ago. After a year or two of quiet education municipal housing will be accepted as the proper thing and legislation will be forthcoming.

Bremerton—Bremerton—long, long ago:
A gray house in Bremerton and white, white snow.
The blue of the water and the blue of the sky—
And Bremerton shall have my heart until I die.

The little port of Bremerton's a land-locked place,
Set about with green trees and ferns like lace.
The birds fly low in Bremerton, and East and West
The weary ships to Bremerton creep in for rest.

There's clover at the threshold, and rue beside the walk;
And in the grass the muttering of banshee talk.
No candles at the window—no laughter through the trees—
Black mustard in the garden, but no heartsease.

Bremerton—Bremerton—long, long ago:
A gray house in Bremerton and white, white snow.
The blue of the water and the blue of the sky—
And Bremerton shall have my heart until I die.

The Progressives Progress

(The Nation's Weekly Washington Letter)

By WILLIAM HARD

IN the House of Representatives at this writing the "progressives" seem to have made much more progress than in the Senate. The chances seem to be—at this writing—that there may be a considerable revival of the prominence and also indeed of the importance of the House of Representatives during this session of Congress.

Part of the reason for this development is as follows:

In the House the "progressive group" has a firm and highly disciplined nucleus in the ten Republican members from Wisconsin who are so securely established—for the most part—in their districts at home that they can readily afford to bid defiance to all ideas of national Republican "regularity."

In the Senate there is no such nucleus for the "progressive group." In the Senate Wisconsin itself is one-half "progressive," if the word "progressive" is used in its current technical Washington sense. Senator Lenroot of Wisconsin does not belong to the "progressive group." Senator La Follette of Wisconsin does indeed belong to it and was its organizer. His amazing control of popular support in Wisconsin has been one of the chief factors in giving to the House of Representatives a Wisconsin delegation in which, barring Mr. Berger of Milwaukee, every member is a "progressive" and a belligerent "progressive." La Follette has insured to this session of the House of Representatives a continuous lively "progressive" disturbance. In his own division of the Congress, however, he has not been so successful, and he could not be.

He himself at this writing is still physically unable to attend the sessions of the Senate, and although it is authoritatively reported that his health is now improving it is regarded as unlikely that he will be able in the Senate to carry the burden of his own work and then also to give to the "progressive group" the discipline which it needs.

The House "progressives" are led by Congressman Nelson of Wisconsin, a hard-bitten wary fighting veteran, who has been in politics since 1892 and who at the end of eight terms of service in the House of Representatives retains an unexhausted enthusiasm and energy on behalf of his original and unrevised variety of "progressivism." He was reelected to this present Congress by a vote of four to one.

He is assisted in the management of the "progressive group" in the House by Congressman Woodruff of Michigan, who serves the "progressive group" as its secretary. Nelson has been known for a rather anti-war attitude. Woodruff served as an enlisted man in the Spanish-American War; and then in the World War he served two years as an infantryman and rose to the rank of major in the course of duty in France. He is as inflexible a "progressive" as Nelson. He is also equally strong in his district. He was elected to the last Congress by a majority of 30,000 and he was reelected to this Congress without opposition. He is suave in manner, buoyant in action, hopeful of the future.

If the "progressives" in the House were able to win their first skirmish and to hold together against Gillett for Speaker until Floor Leader Longworth of the Republicans came forward with his peace plan for an harmonious revision of the House rules, it was because the Wisconsin delegation and the leadership furnished by Nelson and Woodruff had aggressive experienced skilfulness in Washington and assured strength back home.

In the Senate the situation is immensely more difficult for the "progressive group." With La Follette temporarily absent the leadership of the "progressive group" in the Senate devolved with greater weight than ever upon Senator Norris of Nebraska, who is in any case its leader by title. Senator Norris, however, is about to retire from senatorial politics. He no longer enjoys the senatorial political struggle. He regards it as water in a sieve, as dust in the mouth, as a stone rolled up hill only to roll itself down.

It accordingly happened that a good deal of the leadership of the "progressive group" in the Senate devolved then upon Senator Brookhart of Iowa. The problem was, and is, one of organizing the Republican members of the senatorial "progressive group" in such a way as to enable them to form a sort of "third party" in between the regular Republicans and the Democrats. The Republican majority in the Senate is so slender that if four "progressive" Republicans act independently of it the result is that it thereupon ceases to be a majority.

It turned out that the number of Republicans willing to attend the meetings of the "progressive group" in the Senate was not much more than four.

Senator Capper of Kansas, who joined the "progressive group" last spring, was not observed attending its meetings this fall. Nor was Senator McNary of Oregon. The Senators attending were Norris of Nebraska, Borah of Idaho, Brookhart of Iowa, and Ladd and Frazier of North Dakota. Borah of Idaho was sometimes diverted from attendance by other duties. The Republican element of the "progressive group" was in such circumstances reduced in its active meetings to a membership literally and exactly of four.

Of these four Norris is experienced but about to go away; Ladd has been here only half a term; Brookhart has been here a year; Frazier has been here only a few days.

It further happens that Brookhart and Ladd and Frazier naturally have not yet been able to build up in their own States any such political security as exists in Wisconsin for Nelson or in Michigan for Woodruff.

When these facts are observed with a regardful and a cold eye, they indicate that skilful and experienced and aggressive maneuvers by the "progressives" in the Senate will inevitably be likely to be less frequent and less effective than by the "progressives" in the House. That is the logic, though of course not necessarily the outcome, of the situation. There is always the chance that logic may be overcome by some outburst of defiant human impulse.

It happens further that the first domestic questions of importance which seem likely to come to a head in Congress are the questions of taxes and of the bonus. Both these questions will have their first battlefield in the House.

The House "progressive group" will try to present, and will perhaps succeed in presenting, a solid front both to the tax problem and to the bonus problem. It is strongly disposed toward favoring the bonus and it is strongly disposed toward refusing to give to taxpayers in the "upper brackets" the reductions which Mr. Mellon asks for them.

On the bonus accordingly and on the Mellon taxation plan the "progressive group" in the House will have a head-on collision with the Administration; and then, in company with the Democrats, it will give Washington—as things now seem—its first great legislative combat of the season.

In the Driftway

THE press has been buzzing with the story of a Jersey miss who has been left a fortune by an old man she had befriended in time of illness. That the young lady had believed her benefactor to be a penniless old man in need of human cheer should not prejudice the world except in her favor. Well, it's a pretty story, and makes excellent material for eloquent press writers, but the Drifter has no violets to throw at the young lady's feet. The thing that bothers him is the leaving of legacies under any circumstances. Somehow it doesn't strike him as a particularly fair way of allotting worldly accretion. Did the young lady really earn this money? One soberly questions it, while as soberly doubting whether, placed in the young woman's position, one would be beset by such ethical qualms and questionings.

* * * * *

AS for the Drifter he has some doubts. He can even fancy himself reaching for his hat and starting off on an immediate quest for ailing old citizens with fortunes tucked away in some convenient bed-tick. And until he finds one, anybody at all is at liberty to call his bluff and try him out on this slightly uncertain economic theory. Meanwhile, his favorite inheritance story happened in Brittany. He was walking without much aim or direction through that delightful country, as different from the rest of France as black from white. About half way between Penmarch and Pont-l'Abbé a little side road, overgrown and green, took his fancy, and pursuing it for half a mile or so he came upon a house, part brick and part stone, with a fine sixteenth-century flavor and less like the conventional chateau than an English Georgian dwelling. In front of it a man in sad-looking trousers and shirt and a superb Gallic mustache was industriously raking leaves. He did not look up as the Drifter stopped to read the sign in front of the door: "Museum of Breton Antiquities." The Drifter entered, observed the ancient Celtic pottery and stone tagged with bits of paper much the worse for wear and no dusting, and engaged the buxom housekeeper in conversation. The museum, he learned, was a celebrated one; a fine scholar had collected the specimens, among them many Druid relics, and had had besides an unusual library. At his death it had gone to his son. The Drifter naturally put the question. "The son? Ah, to be sure, monsieur; outside; you must have passed him as you came in. He cares nothing for these things; he lives the life of a simple peasant; he will be no scholar, no, not he." THE DRIFTER

Non-Sectarian Student Relief

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In The Nation for November 14 appeared an article, Student Pogroms in Europe, which said that relief organizations in Europe discriminated against Jewish students. This unfortunately led college students here to believe that the work of the European Student Relief was not administering impartially. May we correct this impression by bringing to your attention one of the fundamental principles which characterizes the work of this organization, that "relief is to be administered impartially, without regard to race, nationality, or creed or any other criterion than proven need." We are inclosing proof of the work of the organization among Jewish students.

New York, November 17 HELEN OGDEN,
Executive Secretary, Student Friendship Fund

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: It was farthest from my thought to imply that an international organization such as the European Student Relief discriminated against the Jews. In fact, I looked into the work of the E.S.R. at a number of Central European university centers and found the attitude of the organization and the men in charge thoroughly impartial, and this observation was confirmed by the local Jewish students. I did say—and this the E.S.R. might meditate upon—that the national relief organizations of the students themselves, Polish, German, Austrian, etc., were, with few exceptions, hostile to the Jewish students. And wherever I found the E.S.R. (who perhaps could not do otherwise) operating through the local national student bodies, as in Warsaw, Lemberg, Cracow, Bratislava, I found—quite unknown to the E.S.R. administrators—the Jewish student discriminated against or altogether overlooked in the distribution of books, clothing, food, etc. In one case, an announcement of a distribution of books, sent by the E.S.R. to the university authorities in Warsaw, to be transmitted by them to the various student societies, was never brought to the attention of the Jewish society. Without attaching the slightest discredit to the E.S.R., and recognizing its absolute impartiality, I have come to the conclusion that due to the intense racial hatreds in this Central European area the best way to administer Jewish student relief is through a Jewish organization. ## Mahatma Gandhi and Jesus of Nazareth

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: As a commentary on Mr. Villard's fine article anent passive resistance in the Ruhr, which the press of the world has wrongly represented as having been defeated by armed force, will you give space to these illuminating observations from Mahatma Gandhi?

> I believe in the doctrine of non-violence as a weapon, not of the weak, but of the strong. I believe that that man is the strongest soldier who dies unarmed with his breast bare before the enemy. I want India to practice non-violence because of her strength and power. . . .

The raison d'etre of the Gandhi method is summed up in these words of the man who is leading hundreds of millions in the world today, to practice the teachings of Jesus of Nazareth—for, as one of the younger Indians put it recently, non-cooperation has gone beyond the boundaries of our country and is the property of the world:

> Non-violence is the law of our species as violence is the law of the brute. The spirit lies dormant in the brute and he knows no law but that of physical force. The dignity of man requires obedience to a higher law, the strength of the spirit.

Picasso on Fifth

By HERBERT J. SELIGMANN

YOUNG ladies, select and fashionable, in boarding-school assortments, were taken to see them. Cultured young men were seen to faint with delight. Ladies of uncertain age struck attitudes giving one to understand that they felt—inexpressible things. And this because sixteen Picasso paintings and pastels were shown on upper Fifth Avenue in a once elaborate mansion now become an art dealer's paradise. Far, far is this from the days when Señor Pablo Picasso was first introduced in New York, in April of 1911. Strangely enough that first appearance was on Fifth Avenue, too, at the same place where Cézanne, Rodin's water-color drawings, Toulouse-Lautrec, Brancusi, Matisse, Marsden Hartley, John Marin, Arthur Dove, and a host of others were first exhibited in America. It was not then in the 700's, the upper fifties of Fifth Avenue, but at 291, home of the Photo-Secession, that this pioneering took place. Amid what a hubbub the archives of Camera Work will tell.

"The results suggest the most violent wards of an asylum for maniacs, the craziest emanations of a disordered mind, the gibberings of a lunatic!" wrote one enthusiastic newspaper critic. Another gentleman of the press, who was sensitive to Picasso's beautiful draftsmanship, described the work exhibited as "childish wooden images, Alaskan totem poles, and gargoyles smeared with green paint, or weird geometrical jumbles." Another wrote of the "hideous assemblage" that the Spanish painter was presenting, "semblances of human heads covered with green hair and figures which have hexagonal legs." Some scribes were cautious—and respectful. Since then many drops of water have fallen from the sky and rolled under many bridges. The International Exhibition at the Armory brought more Picasso. Two years ago several Picassos were shown at the Sculptors Gallery in Fortieth Street. Last spring Picasso was triumphantly uncovered, if not discovered, in the studio of Mrs. Whitney. And now fame, select boarding-school misses, and the hush of upper Fifth Avenue with soft carpets.

Señor Picasso has again cut loose. His boldness and freedom delight his admirers and disconcert everybody. Two years ago he had enormous figures of women, painted with the calmness of Egyptian sculpture. They seemed hewn in impalpable stone, heavy and brooding and serene, issued from a giant imagination. That period was represented in the pastels and a painting among those recently shown. But Picasso has found a new lyric style, again proving that he has no formula, that he can paint in almost any manner and yet create his own song. Two paintings—rather drawings in paint—seem to herald the new manner, which begins in 1922 and runs through 1923. In these two paint-drawings, named Maternité, an iridescence of color, green and flesh, is lightly painted and on this are drawn the songlike contours of a mother and child. The lines themselves, delineating leaves in one of them, are songs. Color and line seem like separate melodies interwoven in counterpoint. One of the drawings is on canvas, whitened. White has moved Picasso powerfully. He applies it direct in these paintings, marvelously tinted for tones of white skin mantling with blood; or flat and thin, showing the texture of the canvas; or rich, heavy, and brilliant, for high white light. The line drawing in paint, of the two named Maternité, is elaborated and varied in the other canvases. A Saltimbanque, or seated acrobat, in bright red tights, black trunks, with deep purple chair seat, is outlined in black, the face brilliant white, and a white cloth is thrown about the neck and shoulders. The drawing is lean, delicate, and strong.

In all of the canvases the resources are amazingly varied. Picasso models arms and legs from bare canvas, through the lightest brushing to rich strong paint surface. The surface is lovely irrespective of subject, and seems playing against and with the drawing. A harlequin's head is painted in fine pencil strokes against white broadly brushed, and the figure is white, flat white, contours lightly drawn. A woman's figure in a blue gown is modulated by etching-like scratches in the paint. In Femme au Turban a brilliant deep blue head covering tops a brilliant red waist, with brilliant white upon the arms, and a clash of green and violet in the dress. This figure, like the harlequin's, rises with the thrust of a pillar, savagely strong and sure. To Egypt is added the spareness and delicate serenity of Greece, and still it is Picasso.

Part of its acclaim, doubtless, came to this exhibition because visitors could recognize the subjects—all human figures, or heads. The paint loveliness, the invention displayed in the surfaces, however, were a song that, like many a song, happened to be "about" something, to have for its subject the human figure. Lyric is a word that came often to the lips of those who happened into the room. Every sensitive visitor felt here a personality of noble simplicity, one bold and masterly in using the finest resources of his medium.

In face of the simplicity and delicacy and power of these paintings, a few people still cherish their own blindness. They recall the absurdities of bygone chatter. This is the same Picasso precisely about whom the critics wrote in 1911, the same spirit at work, though the man is a dozen years older, but fully as bold and free—with more mastery. Certainly he is one of the freest figures of our time, unique in his utterance. The history of this painter's work in America, beginning with the exhibition at 291, and the puzzlement and opposition of critics and public, culminating in the semi-official sanction of Mrs. Whitney's studio and upper Fifth Avenue, is one that is not without parallel. Blindness of persons who call themselves critics is with us always, and indifference of patrons and museum directors. Twelve years is a short time for mastery to come to its own in New York City. The history is significant not alone because it is Picasso's. The same thing confronts every vital spirit in America.

Without Benefit of Clergy

The Story of the Bible. By Hendrik Willem van Loon. Boni and Liveright. $5.

DESPITE its supposed irreligion the present generation is more likely to give the Bible a romantic reverence than to give it a rational reading. Even those who regard Mr. Van Loon as a sort of theological anti-Christ should, therefore, thank him for having transformed this much-revered but little-read book into a much-debated and widely read volume.

Although Mr. Van Loon went out of his way to write an uncontroversial book, he has unfortunately charted a new battleground for the Fundamentalist-Modernist controversy which today disgraces Protestantism by forcing it to squander in a senseless guerrilla warfare between its members precious energies that should be employed in the prosecution of its basic mission of regenerating individuals and reconstructing institutions on a Christian basis. This "uncontroversial" book has become a storm-center of controversy because it is the first children's version of the story of the Bible which puts the broad results of modern historical criticism into simple words. Not that Mr. Van Loon deliberately set out to translate the results of the "higher criticism" into a book for children. He specifically disavows any such intention. And I believe he means what he says. I cannot join those reviewers who think Mr. Van Loon is a self-conscious theological radical who denies any interest in doctrinalism in order not to scare away orthodox readers. I take him at his word when he says:

"As a matter of fact I am not trying to rewrite the Bible or interpret the Bible or give a modern version of the Bible. I am leaving the Bible most severely alone. The Holy Books have been translated with extreme competency by our Great Grandfathers. I have a profound respect for their labors. I shall not offend their sense of the ludicrous by a futile attempt to improve upon the King James version.

"Neither dare I confess to that profound theological knowledge which is necessary for a critical examination of the Old and the New Testament. Those who expect to read a Bible written against a background of the latest archaeological and philological discoveries will be disappointed. The book merely tells the story as I personally (and in a most uncontroversial fashion) would like to tell it to my own boys. Nothing more and nothing less."

The fact that Mr. Van Loon's version of the story corresponds as closely as it does to the results of modern historical criticism of the Bible is due, I think, not to the fact that Mr. Van Loon has based his book on the detailed work of modern scholars, but simply to the fact that the major conclusions of modern Biblical criticism, arrived at after much burrowing among ancient documents, are just about the conclusions at which any sensible man would arrive if he were able to read the Bible through without any preconceived theological notions. I have always envied the "heathen" who has the chance to read the Bible for the first time. What an advantage he has over the rest of us who have such difficulty in approaching the Bible with the same open-minded honesty we bring to other books! I have often thought that if, by some sort of executive order of an over-seeing Providence, all memory of the Bible, of Christianity, and of theological doctrines could be wiped from the mind of the human race, and a freshly printed copy of the Bible placed in the hands of every member of the human family, we should be suddenly rid of the ruinous controversies that are today despiritualizing the church and a genuine revival of religion would sweep the planet. It is not the Bible that is difficult to understand; it is the theological explanations of the Bible that have befuddled the mind of mankind.

Now, Mr. Van Loon, being a really educated man, has been able to recover something of the freshness and freedom of approach that a man who read the Bible for the first time might enjoy. But we cannot ignore the fact that, despite his intention of keeping his book free from all preaching, Mr. Van Loon has preached a great deal. He has done much besides tell the story. He has dramatized the Modernist conception of the Bible—at least certain important aspects of that conception. And he has done this less by what he has put into the book than by what he has left out of the book. He has frankly left out the stories of the Resurrection and of the Virgin Birth, for instance. Of course, he has a good precedent for not speaking of the Virgin Birth, inasmuch as Jesus Himself never, so far as any existing record indicates, referred to it. Supernaturalism is rather completely deleted from the story. This means, of course, that the book is drawing and will continue to draw the fire of the champions of orthodoxy. But I do not think we have any right to judge this book as an attempt to draft a complete body of religious thought. I wish that Mr. Van Loon had called his book "Stories of the Bible" instead of "The Story of the Bible." We might then have had all the advantage of the freshness, the common sense, the human appeal of his book, without having its wholesome influence blurred by the theological brawls it is engendering.

The book was written for children, but the author clearly could not forget that adults would read it too; with the result that there are stretches of the book that are hardly easy reading for the average boy or girl. But, all in all, it has a dash and a fire that will capture the interest of young and old alike. Mr. Van Loon is a sophisticated man, but he has managed to retain both gusto and simplicity, two virtues that the sophisticated usually throw overboard. The book abounds in clever characterizations. The rather starkly realistic stories of immorality in the Old Testament have been disinfected so that even Mr. Sumner need not be disturbed. Rahab's harlotry is deftly understated in a reference to her as a woman who "was not particular in the choice of her friends." Meticulous critics will point out many technical slips, but these are less serious than the lapses into superstition that often mar such books.

I think it a good thing that Van Loon's "The Story of the Bible" should be on the market alongside Papini's "Life of Christ." Papini's romanticism and Van Loon's rationalism will tend to correct each other. Between the two books, the Carpenter of Nazareth will not suffer greatly, and millions will read afresh the vivid record of mankind's quest for the infinite.

Robert Frost

New Hampshire. A Poem with Notes and Grace Notes. By Robert Frost. With woodcuts by J. J. Lankes. Henry Holt and Company. $2.50.

Selected Poems. By Robert Frost. Henry Holt and Company. $2.

DURING the seven years since "Mountain Interval" Mr. Frost has not been silent. From time to time poems have appeared in magazines or anthologies, and a good many of them, at least among those readers who like Mr. Frost better than any other poet, have become legends. Now at last these come together and fall naturally into the places which they were born to take in the unique unity of their author's work. And as if to emphasize that unity, Mr. Frost as editor has bound them by footnote and cross-reference to a long poem, New Hampshire, which endeavors to express his attitude in general toward the world.

New Hampshire is full of philosophy and fun. If it can be summarized at all, it is a statement of Mr. Frost's partiality to wildness. He likes New Hampshire because it is no good to anybody but itself. It is solitary and queer; it has no standard product for the trade.

> "Just specimens is all New Hampshire has,
> One each of everything as in a show-case,
> Which naturally she doesn't care to sell."

All of its people are different, and its many resources are too slight to be exploited.

> "One of my children ranging after rocks
> Lately brought home from Andover or Canaan
> A specimen of beryl with a trace
> Of radium. I know with radium
> The trace would have to be the merest trace
> To be below the threshold of commercial,
> But trust New Hampshire not to have enough
> Of radium or anything to sell."

It is not much on education, although—worse luck—there is Dartmouth. Its inhabitants have mastered the fine art of wise living by themselves.

The shorter poems round out a volume which is quite as good as any of Mr. Frost's other three, and which stands up very well with "Selected Poems" (1913-1920). Incidentally, these notes and grace notes make it possible to see wherein the indirectness of their poet's method is effective and wherein it fails. At its worst it is a mannerism, a tour de force of syntax; it puzzles with mere obscurity. At its best it is poetry of the subtlest sort, because it carries the conviction that there was no other way to communicate the reticence inherent both in the subject and in the poet. Out of A Star in a Stone-Boat, for instance, an idea gradually emerges which Mr. Frost could not and should not have expressed directly. He has paced all the way around the idea, hinting of this or that aspect; the idea itself is left for the reader to get, and if he is the right kind of reader he will get it and rejoice. In a larger sense also the indirectness of Mr. Frost justifies itself. His love of the country is so profound that he will not say in so many words that he loves it. Indeed, one has the illusion that Mr. Frost would rather not talk at all. Now and then he has confessed to being moved by birches, or an occasional lonely house; but countless other things must wait their day, and most of them will wait in vain. To create such an illusion is to be one poet in ten thousand.

The Witch of Coös was already famous as a ghost story. The Runaway is unsurpassed of its kind. It remains to point out the excellence as narrative of such a poem as The Axe-Helve, the beginning of which slips us so easily and silently—almost alone by means of rhythm—into the situation.

"I've known ere now an interfering branch
Of alder catch my lifted axe behind me.
But that was in the woods, to hold my hand
From striking at another alder's roots,
And that was, as I say, an alder branch.
This was a man, Baptiste, who stole one day
Behind me on the snow in my own yard
Where I was working at the chopping-block,
And cutting nothing not cut down already.
He caught my axe expertly on the rise,
When all my strength put forth was in his favor,
Held it a moment where it was, to calm me,
Then took it from me—and I let him take it."

Economics—Antiquarian and Academic

Economics of the Hour. By J. St. Loe Strachey. G. P. Putman's Sons. $2.

The Control of Industry. By D. H. Robertson. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $1.50.

"ECONOMICS OF THE HOUR" Mr. Strachey has called his latest volume. Economics of what hour? one cannot refrain from asking, after reading this amazing and frequently amusing congeries of eighteenth-century comment and judgment on twentieth-century problems. But the book is important, nevertheless, and demands a closer analysis. In the first place, Mr. Strachey is not some obscure college professor: for many years he has been the distinguished editor of the London Spectator, the organon of conservatism in England, and as such, the ex officio defender of "Individualism, Independence, and Freedom," and the severe critic of collectivism in every form. Most important of all to us in this country, Mr. Strachey gives expression to economic conceptions shared by many of our own citizenry—conceptions long since abandoned by informed observers and students, but still clung to affectionately by those whose individualistic psychology has lagged decades behind the industrial development of the world.

It is inevitable that in supporting an eighteenth-century laissez faire psychology in the midst of our industrial society, Mr. Strachey should put himself into all manner of ludicrous positions. His naivete, and his incredible ignorance of the simplest realities of industrial life are as choice as can be found anywhere: they rank with the pronouncements on social questions of our own Supreme Court! For instance, he frowns upon legislation regulating the conditions of labor for women, and, as he tilts back in the comfortable editorial chair, says blandly: "The ordinary instances of unsuitable work for women should be left to the instinct of chivalry in the men." (Could Gilbert and Sullivan do better than that?) Inspection laws to protect the safety and health of workmen he disapproves of: let the men take care of their own safety—do their own inspecting. "A man can far better secure his own health and safety than any number of inspectors," he says. From such dicta, among many others of like sagacity, it is clear that Mr. Strachey has never been inside a modern industrial plant, or if he has, has learned not a thing from his experience. When he tries to think about industry, like most individualists of his stripe he is back in the days of the small shop. It is not only in this childlike conception of industry that Mr. Strachey shows that he lives between the editorial office and his club: "In the olden days, the bad old days . . . the state often fell into the hands of a particular class and this class used the power of the state not for the general good but in the interest of the ruling classes." Innuendo: today government is in the hands of all the people, and is conducted for the common good.

In his condemnation of modern collectivist and democratic tendencies on the ground that they interfere with "Individual Freedom" there are many who will agree with the distinguished conservative, though they share few of his illusions about economic problems in general. But the forces which cabin and confine individual freedom are not simply the result of collectivism, as Mr. Strachey's gifted countrymen the Webbs have pointed out.

Another preachment which runs through the book is likewise a familiar one in this country. It can be summed up in our war-time slogan, shouted to the worker from all sides: "Produce! Produce!" Mr. Strachey, however, puts it into a studied formula to this effect: the present division of the total product of industry between money and labor cannot be revised; "it is useless to argue about the division of the cake, for that is settled . . . on immutable principles," Mr. Strachey assures the worker. The way to increase his share is to increase the total product greatly, by working harder, by not limiting output, by eliminating strikes, and so forth. The total product being greater, by the same division the worker will receive a greater quotient. Nothing could be simpler! Unfortunately for the symmetry of the theory, the truth is that increasing general productivity does not benefit the worker according to the reasoning suggested. Statistical analysis by Mr. Soule, for instance, shows that although production in this country has increased about 80 per cent since the beginning of the century (so that under the Strachey argument each worker would now have 30 per cent more of the resulting product than he had in 1900), as a matter of cold fact the purchasing power of his wages has decreased 10 per cent in that period. Nor are the principles upon which Mr. Strachey and his friends proceed "immutable." Recent economic history has convinced most students of industry that the conception of "inexorable economic laws" must be laid to rest, and that economic forces can successfully be subjected to social control.

All in all, Mr. Strachey's rubrics of an economic day which has gone forever, present as clear and convincing a discussion of economics as Tweedledum's masterpiece of logic. "Contrariwise," continued Tweedledum, "if it was so, it might be; and if it were so, it would be; but as it isn't, it ain't. That's logic." "And," Mr. Strachey would add, "that's economics."

With the keen scalpel of his acicular prose, Mr. Robertson dissects our economic organization so that its structure and the manner of its functioning are revealed. He makes it clear that our system is not the invention of the fat-jowled, silk-hatted "capitalist" of the cartoons: it is rather the product of centuries of industrial development. Extraordinary as it may seem, it is an economic system which runs itself: "the multitudinous economic activities of the world . . . govern themselves with all the . . . elasticity and variety of freedom." Largely because of this very uncoordination, experiments in industrial enterprises to correct the grievous defects in the scheme may "try their luck side by side" with the predominating plan. These efforts to amend or supplant capitalism Mr. Robertson presents succinctly and with discernment: producers' and consumers' cooperation, of which he gives a shrewd analysis; collectivism, the real significance of which he, in large measure, fails to comprehend; communism, for which, despite his scientific manner, he shows impatience. The crest of the book is reached when, in an eloquent passage, he describes the task which confronts these reformationists: "The control of industry requires not so much to be wrested from a band of supermen who are keeping it in some secret cupboard, as to be painfully built up out of the clay of man's ever-changing technical achievement, and fixed out of the troubled atmosphere of his tumultuous needs and desires."

The impulse to translate life into terms of points and rules is a characteristic of the academic mind, and because Mr. Robertson (who is a Fellow and Lecturer of Trinity College, Cambridge) has succumbed to this temptation, the latter half of his book is a sorry anti-climax. He formulates a proposition which he calls the "Golden Rule of Capitalism," and this he makes the centripetal point of his analysis for the remainder of the book. The "rule" is to this effect: "where the risk lies, there the control lies also." This (as Mr. Kittredge once said in another connection) is brilliant, but it is not true. Exceptions which nullify the rule can be cited off-hand: the contribution of the workers to industry; the public utilities and the national banks in this country and elsewhere; the thousands of small stockholders; cooperative enterprises, and so on. There is no less profitable occupation, whether for a Marx or a Robertson, than the formulation of "rules" in a field which has long defied this trick of the academician.

Scrut Pudding

Riceyman Steps. By Arnold Bennett. George H. Doran Company. $2.

Young Felix. By Frank Swinnerton. George H. Doran Company. $2.

MR. BENNETT has always made his best books out of his most unpromising material. When, for example, he has chosen some lively attractive girl as his heroine and the colorful eager life of London or Paris as his background he has seldom succeeded in being more than jauntily trivial or in extracting more than the surface values from his themes; but give him a group of thoroughly dull people moving in the stodgiest possible society and he wrings from them every drop of human interest which they contain. The most incorrigible of optimists, he seems never really to rise to his task of proving human life worthwhile except when the task seems hopeless, but when there come to his hands the people whom he best understands—people petty and dull even beyond the ordinary limits of pettiness and dulness—he can make them seem impassively heroic and significant of something besides the stupid persistence of the human race; he can make us love them for their very commonness and agree, momentarily at least, that the most significant thing about human nature is not its depths or its heights but its every-day levels and the seldom clarified muddles of its mild vices and virtues.

The whitewashing of villains and cut-throats or the investing of the extremity of squalor and baseness with romantic glamor is comparatively easy, but it is doubtful if any writer ever achieved a more amazing feat than Bennett did when he made the monumental sogginess of the Five Towns interesting and convinced us, as he certainly did, that even there the burden of life was, in his own words, an "exquisite burden." The effect produced by his deliberate, tough-minded delight in swallowing the most indigestible portions of human life is hard to analyze but Max Beerbohm succeeded in transliterating it perfectly in his parody in "A Christmas Garland." When the hero of that sketch is presented on Christmas day with a liberal portion of scrut pudding—a delicacy peculiar to the hearty workmen who scorn the luxury of raisins and substitute a liberal admixture of pieces of broken pottery—he not only crunches it all between his teeth but passes his plate for more, in that act winning the heroine's heart and exhibiting Mr. Bennett's soul. The novelist reveals his unassuageable appetite for life by relishing it in its most unpalatable forms.

"Riceyman Steps," an excellent novel and quite the best which its author has written in some years, contrasts a stupidly good person with a stupidly evil one and succeeds in awaking almost equal interest in and affection for the two. The book is described by the publisher as taking Mr. Bennett "back to the pleasantly leisurely method of narration which marks 'The Old Wives Tale' and 'Clayhanger' and which to the true Bennett lover is one of his surest charms," but the book has the old-time flavor less because of the method of narration than because the author has abandoned his pose as pocket philosopher and again occupied himself with people unordinarily ordinary. One may expect in the beginning that the middle-aged bookseller hero is going to be picturesque or quaint but nothing is further from the truth. He turns out to be as petty a human being as ever novelist created and his ruling passion is avarice, not spectacular or dramatic, but trivial and mean. With the utmost relish Bennett traces meticulously every detail of his hero's cheeseparing and every phase of his commonplace, ineffective relations with his wife. Yet when in the end both die of undernourishment and the shop passes away the reaction of neither author nor reader is cynical; one feels simply that some very typical flesh has gone the way of all such, and one pays the tribute of sympathy which the common humanity demands.

It is but fair to add that the atmosphere of almost unrelieved littleness which surrounds this precious pair is relieved by the figure of the servant girl whose loyalty and goodness are rooted as deeply in the dim recesses of her uncomprehending soul as avarice is rooted in the soul of her master, but Bennett will allow us to surround her life with no fictitious glamor either, for when she disappears with her lover he adds the last lines of the book: "Elsie and Joe were characteristic of the district. They would have had to look much worse than they did to be classed as humble in Clerkenwell. Nor were people shocked at the spectacle of the woman lugging a heavy grip-bag while the man carried naught. Such dreadful things were often witnessed in Clerkenwell." Life, he seems to say in a sort of parody of Nietzsche's phrase, is interesting because it is dull.

Frank Swinnerton's new novel, cast in the form of a biography, tells the story of the boyhood and youth of a man of artistic sensibilities who is born into a shiftless family from which he inherits both a talent for non-success in life and a cheerfulness which makes him accept failure as a matter of course. The book has the freshness and force of style which marked "Nocturne," but it suffers somewhat from the fact that many of the necessary incidents in the biographical story of a young man have been endlessly repeated in the contemporary novel. It is more diffuse, too, than "Nocturne" and lacks the unified dramatic roundness which was one of the most striking features of that excellent story. But the conception of character is both fresh and interesting, and as the book appears to be but a portion of a larger work it will be perhaps better to postpone final judgment until the rest is published and to say simply that it seems promising. The plan and purpose of the whole will probably be more evident as the story progresses.

Roland Hayes

IT sometimes happens, though not often, that an artist imprints upon his work so much of what we call his soul that to do full justice to the one we must understand the other. Such an artist is Roland Hayes, the Negro tenor. To write only of his singing would not be enough, although that alone would place him in the front rank of concert artists regardless of race or nationality. I should certainly call him our finest American lieder singer, for the "spirituals," in which he is supreme, are only a part of his art after all. He has a tenor voice of rare beauty and unusually rich middle register, and its wide range and easy production enable him to give with equal perfection the lyric loveliness of a song or the dramatic force and accents of an aria. With unusually fine musical sensibilities he has an ear for languages so acute that whether it is Purcell in English, Handel in Italian, Bach in German, or Fauré or Massenet in French, he sings with impeccable taste and diction, never once straying from the picture in the frame.

But these attributes form after all only the husk of his art. Its substance is something quite otherwise, an inward element that bears the stamp of an experience more spiritual even than artistic. It brings to his art what my old singing teacher used to call "the most wonderful quality in the world," namely, tenderness; because where passion can tear a singer to pieces and leave the auditors cold, against tenderness there is no defense. It is a quality that lends enchantment to the voice, yet it is not always included in the "artistic temperament." Clément has it in a marked degree, as has also his youthful successor, Baugé. But while in the French tenors it takes on a certain sensuousness, in Hayes it seems to spring from a deep and pure humanity, subjecting all that he sings to a sort of spiritual alchemy. And not all that he sings can stand the test. Pseudo-sacred music like Dvorak's setting to the magnificent text of his seventh Biblical song becomes unbearably cheap, like a commonplace church solo. Even the "Dieu" of César Franck's "Procession" seems a bit futile, the mysticism vanishing into thin air. Yet such an atmospheric fragment as Fauré's "Clair de Lune," stripped of all sensuous nuance, will gleam suddenly like the ray of pale moonlight it was meant to be. And the "spirituals," like no other songs in form and content, will shine as pure gold, bearing a strange kinship to old masters like Bach, as though they were merely repeating a familiar message in new words. Here is an interpretation of music that is independent of schools, and, to understand it fully, one must go to the man himself.

A Negro, born and raised in the South, he received at birth two gifts, the musical heritage of his race and the religious faith of a mother who had learned the healing qualities of that faith during her early years of bondage. These two gifts he has cherished, trying always to be true to what was best in himself as a Negro and as a man. And with these two gifts to guide him, he has gone his way, simply, recognizing no material barriers, and removing mountains of prejudice as he went. His first step was to take singing lessons in the face of the theory that the Negro voice loses its individual, natural beauty when it is cultivated. This theory he has definitely smashed, for his voice has not only retained its rich warmth, but also that curiously sympathetic quality peculiar to his race.

During his years of study in the South he worked as a waiter, and when he finally went North to live he seems to have taken with him the respect of his white patrons, as they subsequently proved. He remained North for some years, chiefly in Boston, completing his vocal studies, giving occasional concerts, and even venturing a debut in New York, where, as I remember, he received unusually good notices. Then he found that there was no place for him yet as an artist in a country which had just fought to "make the world safe for democracy." So he went to Europe, where kings and titles and class distinctions still abound, and there he found recognition wherever he went, was lionized by the aristocracy of Paris and London, and was even "commanded" to sing before royalty. But of none of these things does he speak. If you ask him why he went to Europe he will tell you that he went to learn the languages and to try to understand the people, because he felt that if he could understand them he could understand their music. It is because he understands his own race, he adds, that he is able to sing their "spirituals" so well, and he feels that the same principle could be applied to all humanity. By building on the best qualities in himself that are peculiar to his race, as well as those that are common to all mankind, he hopes to prove that the Negro can be a universal artist, something more than a singer of "spirituals." In this way, and not by making a racial issue of his art, or of his career as an artist, he hopes to win recognition for his race. And he is accomplishing his aim. The citizens of Louisville, Kentucky, where he worked so long as a waiter, have asked him personally, through the editor of the Louisville Courier-Journal, to come back and sing for them. And this request has pleased him more than all the commands of kings. For now that the South has begun to welcome him on his merits as a man and as an artist he knows that he has at last been able to show to his people a light where before all was darkness, and a safe footpath on a road that was deemed impassable. And so, seeking the verities of his art through those of life, he has been able to transmute that art from an expression of formal beauty into a spiritual utterance. HENRIETTA STRAUS

What Have Books for Children to Do with Internationalism?

WHO cannot recall early bigoted impressions of nationalities? I remember best the English schoolboy's attitude toward the Frenchman. It was that he was an effeminate eater of frogs and snails! With that (before the days of Edward VII and the Entente Cordiale) we dismissed him. What English schoolboy ever read a French "Tom Brown's School Days"? Did they go to school? Oh, well, if they did it was probably to some Cat's Cradle Institute or Needle Work Nursery!

How many race hatreds derive their perpetuation—if not their origin—from legends, from fairy tales, from sagas told around the peat hearth or the tribal camp fire? Wrongs, real or imaginary; grievances exaggerated or accurately re-told; ready-made, second-hand, traditional impressions; biases—antipathies that grew more deadly as every new generation drove them further from the reasoning, deeper into the instinctive, field: who shall say what harm they did? Who shall count the wars they brought about?

And if our forefathers could educate race hatreds into their children, we should be able to educate race hatreds out of ours. And education is not just dates and multiplication tables. Education is home, friends, games, story-books, life.

Desultorily the World today is trying to get back into old suits of clothes—pre-war mufti suits—and wondering why they don't seem to fit any more. Until the problems of internationalism are acknowledged and faced Society and Civilization cannot go forward from the pass they have now reached. We must proceed with our evolution or let repeating history bring us back to 1914.

We have had expensive experiments in Internationalism. We have had costly, chilling reactions. And still the suits don't fit. And still, noisily, we wonder why. While all the time we know.

No one can contemplate, in this world crisis of 1923, the patent crying need for encouraging the International Idea without realizing that one of the safe roads toward the goal is that of the Children, of Education.

And education is not only school. Education is home, games, story-books—life.

subjected to them all, unless his aesthetic skin can somehow combine sensitiveness with reasonable thickness, is likely to be lost. I proceed to the events of a given week to make good these feeble but not quite importless generalizations.

The week began on Sunday afternoon with the répétition générale—why not dress rehearsals?—of Les Ballets Suédois at the Century Theater. I do not ask: why not Swedish Ballets? For the fact is that only the names of the dancers and some most agreeable folk-tunes in a single number have anything to do with Sweden. The symbolic poems or scenarios which the dances illustrate are by M. Jean Cocteau and by M. Paul Claudel; the music is largely the work of M. Darius Milhaud. The theme and mood of the first two ballets, Skating Rink and Les Mariés de la Tour Eiffel, are of a devastating dryness of the soul. Here is lethargic despair and an irony that, in its gross and complete bitterness, verges on the obscene. M. Claudel's "plastic poem," L'Homme et son Désir, is full of a large imaginativeness but one that has no freshness, no dew, no star. Everything is close, sultry, miasmic. Little can be said of the dancing in these ballets, since there is, in fact, little dancing. There is pantomimic gesture of a symbolic sort and I cannot think it more than adequate at any point. What counts here is the music, and I need hardly say that it is music of the ultra-modern sort, wholly unmelodic, wholly dependent for its values on the printed program and the pantomimic gesture. There is a fashion in which it undoubtedly illustrates both. Without them it would be meaningless. This merely illustrative art is, except at occasional moments, crudely realistic. When in L'Homme et son Désir the noises of a primeval forest are to be musically illustrated, the percussion instruments are augmented by two slats ripped out of a packing case and struck together, and among the wood-winds a wry-faced gentleman is seen to blow a screechy penny-whistle of tin. This is new; it is assuredly not subtle. I do not deny that this music has moments when it makes the nerves quiver; the deeper part remains cold. The Swedish legend on the theme of the foolish virgins is quaint and charming and the Swedish folk-tunes have lovely melodic curves and flights.

On Monday Mr. John Barrymore reopened in "Hamlet" at the Manhattan Opera House. Unless my memory is outrageously at fault his performance was clearer and more clearly beautiful last year and has now taken on a tinge of morbidness that warps it. His tenderness is now oversoft and his facial expressions are almost neurasthenic in character. His Hamlet remains a performance of the highest distinction and several of his fellow-players continue to give the best interpretations of those parts that have ever been seen. That is true of the Queen, of Polonius, of the First Grave-Digger.

Next, in this week, came the usual trade goods—"Time" (Thirty-ninth Street Theater), an agreeable but quite unimportant little comedy, and "In the Next Room" (Vanderbilt Theater), a detective mystery melodrama very ingeniously contrived, in which the villain who, in such plays, was always a Frenchman before 1914, a German from 1914 to 1918, a Russian from 1918 to 1922, is a Frenchman again!

The necessary limitations of time and human strength prevented this deponent from seeing any of the remaining offerings of the week except "Laugh, Clown, Laugh" (Belasco Theater), a play which illustrated like every other of its origin that I have read the feeble fantasticality and thick, unashamed tearfulness of the contemporary Italian theater. This piece of emphatic picturesqueness and violent but stale emotional antitheses is staged by Mr. Belasco with his accustomed taste and skill and smoothness and the part of the Clown is admirably portrayed by Mr. Lionel Barrymore. He creates a good and forlorn and very concrete human being whose sufferings could move one deeply were they not so obviously patched out of a hundred similar theatric anecdotes which have drawn easy tears so long and so often that, in all but the veriest innocents, this particular source is dry.

"Reactionaries of All Countries, Unite!"

By EMIL LENGYEL

On November 7, one day before the outbreak of the "beer-hall revolution" in Munich, a detachment of Hungarian soldiers surrounded the Vienna express train coming from Budapest and arrested one of the passengers, Dr. Francis Ulain, a member of the Hungarian Parliament. They found in his possession a passport to Munich and an "international agreement" signed, as between the Bavarian and Hungarian states, by Dr. Adalbert Szemere and Titus von Bobula on behalf of Hungary, and visaed by Herr Doehmel, "diplomatic delegate," on behalf of Bavaria. Ulain's errand was to have the agreement signed by Adolf Hitler as the supposed representative of the sovereign Bavarian state. The document, which is now in possession of the Budapest police, contains provisions of a diplomatic and military nature. It virtually restores to Hungary the territory adjudicated to the succession states by the Treaty of the Trianon. At the same time it provides, in the main, that Bavaria is to supply Hungary with soldiers, particularly with such as have some special training, and which, it is implied in the text of the agreement, could be used in case Hungarian labor should strike as a protest against the "liberating action" of the reactionaries. On the other hand, Hungary promises to furnish Bavaria with foodstuffs. The full text of the agreement as it is reprinted in the Bécsi Magyar Ujság of Vienna is as follows:

Preliminary Agreement Between the Bavarian and Hungarian States Toward a United Political and Military Action

1. In view of the identical interests and purposes of the contracting parties their close cooperation is agreed upon in all respects and under all circumstances.

2. Notwithstanding this identity of political and military interests and purposes, the sovereignty of both contracting parties remains unaffected, so that interference of one in the political affairs of the other is declared inadmissible unless the other party consents.

3. Both contracting parties reserve the right to enter into other international agreements provided such agreements do not affect unfavorably the interests of the other party.

4. If one of the parties enters into an agreement with a third Power that is injurious to the interests of the other contracting party, a compensatory agreement is to be concluded.

5. The Bavarian state recognizes the pre-war boundaries of the Hungarian state. The Hungarian state extends to Bavaria a reciprocal recognition of its frontiers. Should one of the contracting parties decide upon the annexation of foreign territory, the other contracting party obligates itself to recognize such annexations, provided they do not affect its interests.

6. The identity of the task to be performed renders it the duty of both contracting parties to supply each other with all the material means at their disposal in order to attain the desired end.

7. The Bavarian state obligates itself to supply the Hungarian state with all materials which it may need. The same applies to the Hungarian state. [The first and second inclosures of this document set forth in detail the services most urgently needed by each contracting party.]

8. In addition to the aid mentioned in the first and second inclosures Bavaria supplies Hungary with specially trained soldiers. [The third inclosure furnishes a mere detailed explanation of this section.]

9. The contracting parties are obligated to notify each other of the time of the military action which they have agreed to execute with a view to establishing the governmental system which they desire. (Note: The Hungarian military action will probably take place toward the end of November of the current year.)

10. This agreement is provisional. After the military actions, conferences are to be held by the contracting parties in order to pass finally upon the relations of the newly constituted states.

Supplementary Clause:

Both states agree to postpone solution of the problem of monarchy until after the termination of the military actions.

Budapest, November 3, 1923
Munich, ......................

Dr. Adalbert Szemere,
Titus von Bobula
Visaed by:
Doehmel, diplomatic delegate

First Inclosure

Inasmuch as the transports to be effected by Bavaria as determined by the German Kampfbund on October 24, 1923, are not deemed sufficient, it is agreed that the number of troops enumerated in the list of the Kampfbund should be doubled.

Although the materials enumerated in said list are thought sufficient to enable Hungary to start the military action, it is nevertheless agreed that when the Hungarian army is enlarged the material will be increased.

In addition to the men to be turned over to Hungary by Bavaria request is made for officers who would train and organize the Hungarian army, and act as military advisers.

Troops and material should be held at the disposal of Hungary from the day designated by Hungary's representatives.

For the period of one month Bavaria will pay and supply the Bavarian troops in Hungary.

Second Inclosure

Hungary is willing to supply Bavaria with foodstuffs after the military action has been terminated. The transportation of foodstuffs will presumably start in January, 1924, and will include wheat, vegetables, cattle, wine, milk, milk products, and poultry. Final agreement concerning this inclosure will be reached through verbal negotiations in Munich.

Third Inclosure

It is deemed necessary that Bavaria should furnish Hungary with men prepared to perform skilled work in addition to their military activities.

Fourth Inclosure

In view of the importance of the financial provisions to be agreed upon by the contracting parties it is necessary that they should be determined verbally by the Bavarian and Hungarian delegates who are to meet in Munich.

As behooves a document drawn up according to the rules of secret diplomacy this "preliminary agreement" was accompanied by a covering letter which described in detail the measures taken in order to insure the victory of the "military action." Special arrangements had been made to intimidate the inhabitants of Budapest. Coincident with the declaration of the military dictatorship a pogrom was to be executed in all Hungary against the Jews and other "unreliable" elements. How thorough the job would have been is evidenced by another document, seized by the Budapest police, in which the suggestion is made that after their accession to power the dictators should notify the

Alliance Israélite Universelle at Paris that if the Little Entente made the least attempt to interfere with events in Hungary, all Jews—men, women, and children alike—living on Hungarian territory would be massacred.

It is generally assumed in Hungary, and this belief is strengthened by certain passages of the secret agreement, that the two coups d'etat were not intended to be performed at the same time. It was expected that after the military dictatorship of the Hitlerites had been declared in Bavaria, some of the Bavarian troops would have been utilized in the Hungarian insurrection. A document which was in possession of a certain Dr. Fritz, an agent of Hitler in Hungary, contained strategical outlines for the invasion of Hungary by the Bavarians. According to this document, Bavarian and Austrian Hakenkreuzler (soldiers wearing the swastika, the Aryan symbol) were to enter Hungary as soon as Hitler became victorious in Munich and were to march through Sopron toward Budapest, the Hungarian capital, where they were to be met by the troops of Ulain and of the notorious Gömbös, leader of the "Awakening Hungarians" and other reactionary organizations.

Captain Gömbös, whose name is already familiar to the foreign public, was selected to head the list of the members of what the would-be dictators termed the new "cabinet," which was to oust Count Bethlen, now prime minister of Hungary.

Francis Ulain was the connecting link between the Hungarian and Bavarian insurgents. He figures as "Minister of Justice" in the proposed new reactionary government. He is known in Hungary as a member of the extreme right ever since the white terror was inaugurated in Hungary and as the faithful body-guard of Admiral Horthy, the regent-governor of Hungary. As he was the most humble member of the conspiracy in Hungary, it was he whom the Hungarian authorities arrested despite his parliamentary immunity.

Most interesting in the whole affair is the role of Regent-Governor Horthy. Those Hungarian papers which are published by the Hungarian émigrés and which therefore can express their opinion without danger of criminal prosecution, declare that the evidence presented in this case against the governor shows that he was conspiring against his own government. His friends, the political and military leaders of the white terror, were already complaining that he had let the government drift too far toward "liberalism." Besides, Horthy may have thought that a coup d'etat, timed as judiciously as that to which he owed his governorship, would insure for him permanent possession of his office or might even land him on the Hungarian throne.

The communiqué of the Budapest police headquarters summarizing the cross-examination of Ulain and his accomplices goes far toward disclosing the connection between the governor and the prisoners. Its publication created a sensation in Hungary because it is interpreted to indicate a determination on the part of the Government to take up the challenge to the regent-governor and to expose his relations with the political adventurers.

"Deside Szrubián, police captain," the report of the police says, "who is in charge of the investigation, ordered Francis Ulain, Adalbert Szemere, and Titus von Bobula to be brought before him. Asked about the criminal act with which they were charged, the prisoners declined to testify. They insisted that they should be taken to the regent-governor, Nicholas Horthy, and be allowed to meet him alone. They demanded that the police call up the governor and transmit their statement to him. They were sure, they said, that the governor would desire to see them. When they were told that neither of these requests could be complied with, they repeatedly declared that they would testify only in the presence of the governor. Francis Ulain added that he did not doubt that the governor would come to see them at the police headquarters as soon as their message was received by him. When all their demands were turned down, the prisoners declared that they would not answer any questions."

Titus von Bobula, another conspirator often mentioned in Hungary in connection with the attempted uprising, is an American citizen. Probably it is intuition rather than evidence which makes the Hungarian newspapers insist that he is the representative of a "marvelously rich American."

The seizure of the secret agreement between the Ludendorff-Hitler and Horthy-Gömbös-Ulain extremists calls attention to other prospective "alliances" which were under negotiation between the Bavarian and Hungarian reactionaries on the one hand and Polish and Austrian reactionaries on the other. One of Hitler's lieutenants was carrying on negotiations with Polish reactionaries in which the "renunciation" of East Prussia in favor of Poland was suggested to balance the "willingness of Poland to counterbalance the intervention of Czecho-Slovakia in Bavaria in the case of a military action." Besides this, the Vienna Stunde reports another "alliance" which was planned between the Bavarian and Austrian Hakenkreuzler.

It is logical to assume that the secret agreement concluded between the Bavarian and Hungarian reactionaries and the negotiations with their Polish and Austrian sympathizers were intended to form the basis of a bloc of reactionary states in Central Europe. With their tolerant attitude toward the extreme right both Herr von Kahr in Munich and Count Bethlen in Budapest had seemed to signify that if sufficient force were brought to bear upon them they would be only too glad to yield. When they saw that the insurgents were bungling their way toward destruction they simply turned their backs on them and thus, nolens volens, prevented what history would have recorded as the twentieth-century edition of the Holy Alliance, prefaced—as the Hungarian near-dictators indicated—by a Mid-European massacre of Saint Bartholomew.

Von Kahr at the Beer-Hall

DR. VON KAHR, "dictator" of Bavaria, played an ambiguous part in the Munich beer-hall revolution of November 7. The Münchner Neueste Nachrichten for November 9 contains a full account of the meeting at which the dramatic Hitler coup occurred. From it the following excerpts are taken:

> State Commissioner von Kahr had finished about half of his address. He had just pronounced the following sentence: "Nationalist circles believe that the restoration of a strong state authority would be sufficient. But the strongest man, provided with the greatest power, cannot save the people without active help from the people, help inspired by the national spirit."
> At these words unrest became apparent at the entrance. Loud cries of "Hoch, Hitler," were heard. Hitler himself, pistol in hand, followed by armed men, burst into the room, stepped up to the rostrum, and declared that the beer-hall was guarded by armed men. In order to make himself heard above the din he

The Twilight of Democracy?

Several European countries have lately replaced Democratic government by dictatorships: Germany, Italy, Spain.

Elsewhere this anti-liberal spirit shows itself in attempted curtailment of freedom of speech and the abrogation of full civil rights, if not by governments, then by minority groups.

> At 8:55 Hitler, who had returned, spoke as follows: "Fellow-Germans! Five years ago today the most infamous crime was committed. It plunged our poor unhappy people into this immeasurable misery. I therefore propose:
> "That the Knilling Cabinet be deposed; that a Bavarian government be formed with an administrator and with a prime minister equipped with dictatorial powers. As administrator I propose Herr von Kahr; as prime minister, President Pöhner. The Government of the November-criminals in Berlin, and Ebert with it, is declared deposed. A German National Government will be named here in Munich today, and a German national army will immediately be formed.
> "I therefore propose: Until a reckoning with the criminals who are today driving Germany downward is completed, I undertake the direction of the policy of the German National Government. His Excellency, General Ludendorff, assumes direction of the German national army. General Lossow becomes Minister of National Defense. Colonel von Seiffer becomes chief of the national police. . . ."
> At 9:45 Dr. von Kahr, Hitler, General von Lossow, President Pöhner, and Colonel Seiffer reentered the hall, together with General Ludendorff. Dr. von Kahr, amid stormy applause, declared:
> "Gentlemen: In the fatherland's bitterest need I assume direction of the destiny of Bavaria as viceroy [Statthalter] of the monarchy which five years ago was destroyed by thoughtless hands. I do this with a heavy heart, and—as I hope—for the welfare of our beloved Bavarian home and of our great German fatherland."

After Adolf Hitler had spoken again, announcing that von Kahr, von Lossow, von Pöhner, and von Seiffer had accepted the tasks assigned to them, General Ludendorff spoke, in part, as follows:

> . . . This hour marks the turning-point in German history. Let us enter upon it with a great moral earnestness, convinced of the overwhelming difficulty of our task and impressed with our heavy responsibility. With the rest of the people let us go to our work. If we do this work with pure hearts—German men, I do not doubt it—God's blessing, which we invoke in this hour, will be upon us. Without God's blessing nothing happens. I am convinced, I do not doubt, that God in Heaven, when he sees that German men have at last risen again, will be with us!

The daily newspapers have told how Hitler's "Government" was overthrown on November 9, how Ludendorff was arrested, and how Hitler fled, while von Kahr resumed his old position. The Münchner Neueste Nachrichten for November 10 gives an obviously inspired interpretation of von Kahr's action at the beer-hall:

> In the days and weeks immediately preceding, Hitler had repeatedly, before witnesses, agreed to maintain a loyal attitude toward von Kahr and to undertake no action against him. He had accepted the invitation to be present, in an invited group, when von Kahr made his great proclamation [at the beer-hall on November 7]; and he had promised not to speak on that occasion. He abused the trust placed in him to carry out a putsch and to overcome the state commissioner and his national-minded guests. . . .
> In such a network of conspiracy von Kahr must have experienced the most difficult moment of his life. For he had to act in contradiction to his inner nature. It would have been natural for him to have cast his treachery in the traitor's face. But he knew that if he did that the armed men who dominated the hall would have arrested him and the leaders of the Reichswehr and of the state police, and thereby have destroyed law and order in the state and have brought evils beyond prophecy upon our fatherland. At that moment von Kahr came to a decision which must forever be regarded as one of the greatest and most extraordinary deeds of German history. He, the man of loyalty and truth, apparently surrendered. . . . Had he not made the sacrifice—in full consciousness that he exposed his name and reputation to the worst misinterpretations, in full consciousness (even more serious for him) that he was acting for the first time in his life in contradiction with his own self—then Munich would today be the scene of worse battles than we have experienced.

One's judgment of the significance of the Bavarian-Hungarian negotiations described by Mr. Lengyel must depend in considerable part upon the interpretation placed upon von Kahr's relations with Hitler before and on November 7.

France in the Palatinate

THE German charge d'affaires in Paris delivered to the French Government on October 26 a note in which he complained of the French attempt to create a separatist government in the Rhenish Palatinate. He cited the speech made by Major Louis of the French army before the Kreistag (quoted in the International Relations Section for November 28) and added that after the Kreistag had unanimously rejected the proposal for an autonomous state General de Metz delivered the following note to the Bavarian representative with the occupation authorities:

> The Bavarian Government, by its conduct in the present conflict with the Reich Government, has placed itself outside the constitution, thereby breaking the constitution. The French have to conclude that the executive power of the Bavarian Government no longer exists in the Palatinate. Accordingly the Bavarian officials in the Palatinate no longer have the attributes of sovereignty. General de Metz therefore forbids them further to exercise their official functions. If they wish to remain longer in the Palatinate they may do so only as private individuals. This notice will also be sent to the other Bavarian officials in the Palatinate.

The charge protested in the name of the Government of the Reich against this action, which he called contrary to law and to the Treaty of Versailles. To this protest M. Poincaré replied in a note printed in the Münchner Neueste Nachrichten for November 11. M. Poincaré's note made no mention of the two official French statements against which the charge protested, but said:

> The protest misrepresents the attitude of the French authorities and assigns to them a responsibility which is not theirs. The present difficulties of the Palatinate are not due to the procedure of the French authorities but solely and only to the agitation in Germany which is the consequence of passive resistance. It must be emphasized that the recent events in Germany have brought the Palatinate into an inextricable position which fully explains the unrest of its people. Just as the French Government held entirely aloof from the preparations which led to the outbreak of the separatist action, just as it has held aloof from events in the Rhineland and will remain aloof, so also it can accept no responsibility for decisions which have been made in full freedom by the people of the Palatinate. . . .

The irony of this reply will be appreciated after a study of the documents printed in The Nation for November 28, and of that printed above.

THE appointment of General Charles G. Dawes and Mr. Owen D. Young to serve as American experts on the committee which is to investigate Germany's financial troubles is another step toward our non-political participation in the restoration of Europe, though it must be said that if the Reparation Commission had wished to find out the status of Germany it could have done so long ago. That body has been a tool of the French—nothing more or less; if it is now going to proceed in a detached scientific way, we have advanced. As to the new negotiations between Germany and France, there may be some hope in them, but once more M. Poincaré blocks progress by his statement that there can be no talk of a revision of the treaty and no readjustment of reparations except through the Reparation Commission. Fortunately, there are growing signs that M. Poincaré is learning to change his mind. With the promise of a British Labor ministry in office before long, he does well to reconsider his positions.

ALL right-thinking Americans must be profoundly thankful that at this holiday season we have released the last of our political prisoners sent to jail under war-time federal laws. One man remains in the toils, it is true, whom the Joint Amnesty Committee included in its appeal, but the circumstances in his case put him on a different footing from that of the men who went to jail because of conscientious beliefs which they were courageous enough to declare in an era of hysteria and blindness. But while we are thankful for the vindication of American honor that has been achieved, and although we give full praise to President Coolidge for his part in it, we cannot but feel a certain sadness that this act of justice has come only after some of the men have served more than five years in jail, after prisoners convicted in similar circumstances in Europe had long since been released, and after the opposition of official Washington had been worn down by a prolonged process of attrition and erosion. Neither can we forget that the fight for victims of free speech and opinion is not over. The federal government has released its political prisoners but there are 127 men in Washington, Kansas, Oklahoma, Idaho, Illinois, Pennsylvania, and California (ninety-seven in the latter State alone) imprisoned under absurd and unjustifiable anti-syndicalism laws. We must now voice an aggressive demand for the release of these men and—unless the Supreme Court declares such statutes unconstitutional—for the repeal of the laws as well.

THE action of the Republican National Committee in yielding to the demands of Negro voters and the exigencies of the Coolidge candidacy by restoring the unfair and unjust representation of the Southern States in the Republican National Convention cannot be too strongly censured. It took years of agitation, and President Harding's assistance, to get rid of this scandal on June 17, 1920. Its restoration now is proof positive of the alarm of the presidential machine and of the determination of the President's backers to dominate the convention. There could be no stronger argument for the abolition of the party convention as it now exists. For there is not one single honest reason which can be advanced for the restoration of a system which has no other purpose than to make easy the control, by bribery and corruption, of delegates who represent only a handful of voters.

REVEALING as to the undercurrents of the De la Huerta conspiracy in Mexico is a tiny paragraph in the State Department's announcement of December 11 as printed in the New York Times: "The American consul at Frontera, Tabasco, Robert L. Rankin, telegraphed the Department at 10 a.m., December 10, that the garrison at Frontera revolted at noon December 9 in favor of De la Huerta. The commanding officer was killed and a number of Bolsheviks were executed." Thus a United States consul and the official machinery at Washington help propagate the assumption that any Calles adherent is ipso facto a "Bolshevik." The American press, too, has manfully whooped it up for reaction in its news columns. On the first day it reported nine Mexican states in revolt. With at least one accession daily every one of the twenty-eight states has since been recorded as anti-government. The Chicago Tribune declared in a special dispatch on December 17 that

De la Huerta "is in control of the whole Yucatan peninsula" and that the governor of the state of Yucatan, Felipe Carrillo, "the leading Mexican exponent of Communism," had fled. The facts are that after ten days the revolt, except for isolated mutinies at widely scattered points and a few individual defections, is still confined to the armies of General Estrada in Jalisco and Colima, and of General Sanchez in Vera Cruz. This is not to say that the effects of De la Huerta's treason—especially the material damage—are negligible. But the rebels cannot expect to win. As indicated by documents printed in our International Relations Section, the organized workers have rallied around Obregon, who in this grave crisis and with the country an armed camp, has kept his democratic faith by refusing to curtail the liberty of the press.

PRAISE be! Even in the church the stirrings of progress will not down. No sooner does Bishop Manning rebuke Percy Grant and soundly lecture Dr. Guthrie than Dr. Parks gets up in his pulpit to announce his heresy as to the Virgin birth. More than that, hundreds of other clergymen through their modernist association fling down the gage. Surely this shows once more the folly of trying to sit on a church lid; it proves that, even within the church, men's consciences are alive and that their thoughts refuse to be bound by the heresy hunters. Therein lies the one hope of the church. If it stands still, if it is to be Bryanized, it will die. As for the Episcopal bishops, they have been dared by Dr. Parks to try a fellow of their size instead of putting the Bishop of Texas up to picking on an unknown rector in his diocese. Bishop Manning will find it difficult, indeed, to put on trial the rector of one of New York's most fashionable churches, representing so many millions and so much power.

THE interchangeability of the Republican and Democratic parties when it comes to combating a real effort to make headway against the "system" in Washington requires no better demonstration than the action of Senator Bruce of Maryland, Democrat, in voting for a Republican when there was danger of the election of a progressive Democratic Senator to the chairmanship of the Interstate Commerce Commission in place of Mr. Cummins. Wall Street pins its faith to Cummins; if he goes down, if a so-called radical succeeds him, it will lie awake o' nights in anguish as to what may happen to the Esch-Cummins law and the railroads. Therefore it is not surprising to learn that Senator Bruce was overwhelmed with telegrams of approval for his action. We shall, moreover, not be surprised if other Democrats are found, if necessary, to bolt their own nominee for the chairmanship. We hope they will be, for the Bruce bolt has stirred public opinion not a little in the progressive West. Anything which demonstrates anew the essential twinship of the existing major parties will be of value the country over. Meanwhile, judging from the agonized protests in the conservative press, Congress is rapidly going to the radical bow-wows. Thus Louis Seibold, political correspondent of the New York Herald, telegraphs in alarm that Congress will soon be wrecked if the majority Republicans and the minority Democrats do not immediately strike hands to prevent the La Follette group "from making alliances which would eventually result in disaster to both." Many heretofore conservative Representatives and Senators are considering whether they should not ally themselves with these radicals who have recently done so well at the polls. Mr. Seibold reports that there are enough of these "to help Mr. La Follette achieve his ambition of destroying both the major parties." Who would think from this that Mr. La Follette has never yet bolted his own party?

SO Frank B. Kellogg has been confirmed as our Ambassador to Great Britain and that high office sinks lower than in the lifetime of any living man. President Coolidge has broken not only with the elder tradition that men of statesmen's stature should represent us in London; he has abandoned the more modern idea of having a literary man speak for us at the Court of St. James's. Mr. Kellogg is merely a conventional second-rate lawyer, an ex-Senator discredited and overwhelmingly defeated by his constituency, and we have heard no sound reasons advanced for his appointment save that he is a "lame duck" and should have a nice big office to wind up his career. We cannot even follow the current gossip that his selection is connected with the Coolidge candidacy. If Mr. Coolidge's backers have any sense, they must know that to identify his cause in Minnesota with Mr. Kellogg is to injure it irreparably.

THE death of John R. Rathom of the Providence Journal recalls one of the most despicable episodes of the entire war period—the wholesale lying of that newspaper as to its alleged discoveries of unwarranted activity by the German representatives in this country. Münchhausen was a tyro by comparison; yet these stories went all over the country and are doubtless still believed by multitudes. Mr. Rathom himself came into tremendous vogue as an after-dinner speaker and was engaged by the World's Work to write a series for it which it advertised thus:

> How the devilishly cunning plots to kill our people, sink our ships, dynamite our factories, and disrupt our national life were run down and thwarted. More thrilling than fiction, and withal the most patriotic service to America since the war began. It is the modestly told story of a brave editor and resourceful reporters who beat the Germans at their own game.

After one article the series suddenly stopped and it then appeared that on February 12, 1918, Rathom, under the compulsion of the United States Government and by advice of counsel, signed a confession (printed in The Nation for November 17, 1920) admitting the falsity, or such exaggeration that it equaled falsity, of almost all his alleged revelations. To a number of deliberate misstatements he pleaded guilty. Thereafter Mr. Rathom's career as an after-dinner speaker and newspaper romancer ceased. The World called him at the time a "faker" whose confession is "one which for comprehensive avowals of downright falsehood has few parallels in the annals of mendacity." Yet this confession did not prevent his being retained as manager of the Providence Journal and, mirabile dictu, continuing to sit as a member of the executive committee of the board of directors of the Associated Press.

ONE happy result which is the immediate consequence of Labor's gain and Premier Baldwin's loss in the British elections is the decision to abandon the construction of a naval base at Singapore. The cancelation of the proposed tour of the Earl of Cavan to Singapore and Australasia is regarded as tantamount to throwing the project over, the British press pointing out that as no succeeding cabinet, Liberal or Labor, would be likely to indorse the enterprise, Mr. Baldwin has concluded that the $50,000,000 involved can be better used to relieve the economic distress and widespread unemployment at home. Thus Great Britain is saved not only from a huge economic waste but from an action which would have called for similar expenditure by other countries and must have measurably increased the provocations to war of which the world is already too full. Fortunately the Dutch Government's proposal to erect counter-fortifications in the East was recently squelched by its opponents in the legislature, and need not be revived. If now Secretary Hughes will recall our naval mission to Brazil, which is so upsetting South America, the world will have taken some substantial steps in the direction of peace and good-will.

THE chess game of diplomacy never stops. The players sometimes pause long over their pieces, but they finally move them in just such a formal check-and-countercheck game as of yore. Mussolini found himself excluded by France and England from the Tangier conference; so he turned to Soviet Russia and likewise made an alliance with fascist Spain which threatens control of the Mediterranean trade route. Let no one romanticize over the sympathy of these three dictatorships; similarities in their form of government have nothing to do with this alliance. England and France are trying to edge Spain out of Morocco and to exclude Italy from a conference of Mediterranean Powers. Naturally, Italy and Spain turned to each other; naturally also Mussolini looked to the pariah nation of Europe for help against the two dominant Powers. So the chess game goes on, and the pawns suffer. There is good reason to believe that Mr. Baldwin's reported assent to part of the French policy in the Ruhr was not unrelated to the moves of Mussolini.

LOANS of 400,000,000 francs to Poland and of 300,000,000 to Jugoslavia have been approved by the committees on finance and foreign affairs of the French Senate. The proposed 100,000,000-franc loan to Rumania is postponed for further consideration. The New York Evening Post reports from Washington that France also plans a 500,000-million franc loan to Hungary, and the Paris correspondent of the New York World explains that "a large portion of the proposed loan to Hungary will be sunk in metallurgical works undertaken and controlled by the Schneiders, the powerful magnates of the French war industry. who recently acquired the famous Skoda works, the Austrian Krupps, (now in Czecho-Slovakia), where the big guns were made that smashed the forts of Liège at the beginning of the war." These loans are to be spent for munitions either now on hand or to be manufactured in France. They represent a policy of deliberate militarization of the lesser nations of Europe. America is not, to be sure, in a position to adopt a very much holier-than-thou attitude. John F. Sinclair, the Minneapolis investment banker, has pointed out through the North American Newspaper Alliance that Poland's foreign debt has already grown to $270,000,000, in which is included $24,000,000 owed to the United States Grain Corporation, $51,000,000 to the American Relief Administration, $57,000,000 to the United States Liquidation Commission (for military supplies?), $4,000,000 to our Shipping Board, $24,000,000 to our War Department, and $2,000,000 to the Navy Department. Some of these loans might bear explanation—they are all post-war issues.

EVEN a good law can provide a foolish or timid or tyrannical government with dangerous technical weapons, as for example the Cable law which holds, among other things, that an alien woman may not acquire American citizenship through marrying an American, but must become naturalized herself. The unreasonable use to which such a reasonable piece of legislation can be put is shown in the case of Anna Lerner. Mrs. Lerner was born in Russia but has lived in this country since she was six years old; she is now twenty. Her father died before he could take out naturalization papers and she is still too young to acquire citizenship herself. Two years ago Anna Lerner went to Russia to join the Kuzbas industrial colony, and there she married Noah Lerner, another colonist, an American citizen, and a World War veteran. Her husband came home ahead of her; early last summer he sent back passage money, and Mrs. Lerner went to Riga to sail for the United States. The American consul at Riga refused to visa her passport; the head of the visa division of the Department of State rejected her application; and finally Secretary Hughes himself has decided that Anna Lerner is a dangerous alien who had best be kept out. In everything but a technical sense this girl is American. Her family all live here, her three brothers are citizens, her husband lives here, she was brought up and educated in Philadelphia, she speaks no Russian. In coming back to the United States she would not only be rejoining her husband, she would be coming home. Well, she may not come home. She is a Communist; she went to Russia, and to the limit of her eighteen-year-old abilities tried to help Russian industry to its feet—and Secretary Hughes is afraid that Anna wants to overthrow the Government of the United States.

EACH year the Dial makes an award of $2,000 to the contributor during that year whose total literary production is in the opinion of the editors most striking and most full of promise. Sherwood Anderson received the first award, T. S. Eliot the second, and the third has just been given to Van Wyck Brooks. In "Letters and Leadership" Mr. Brooks has set forth fine and distinguished ideals for the practice of letters in America. It is true that he almost completely lacks humor, and that he expects of American literature the qualities which at present would be but little representative of American life—order and a conscious striving toward intelligent perfection. In "The Ordeal of Mark Twain" he studies his protagonist almost solely with the purpose of finding out how far he has fulfilled, or been permitted by his native culture to fulfil, the obligation of leadership imposed upon him by his art. For Mr. Brooks the consciousness of this obligation is at once the penalty, the reward, and the measure of the artist. The sporadic robustness, the experimental and often crude groping after some vague accomplishment which is so much a part of the growth of American letters are qualities which do not interest him. Nevertheless, the ideal of a perfect if somewhat cool culture, led on and nourished by the practice of letters, is a noble one and deserves the steadily increasing following which Mr. Brooks has won for it.

Thou Shalt Not Despair

To George W. Norris, United States Senator, Greeting:

For twenty years you have sat in the seats of the powerful in Washington and served your country faithfully and well. During all that time, unlike many of your legislative associates, your soul has been your own, your voice the voice of reason and justice, your vote the vote of conscience. Wherever you have gone men have respected you, political opponents have envied and feared you. They saw you enter the Senate a reformer, a progressive; some among them laughed cynically and, pointing to many an example in the Senate Chamber, declared: "The system will overcome him." The system found itself baffled by a brave and honest man. The years passed; you were progressive still. The Great War came, beclouding men's minds, instilling passion into their hearts, making them give out only words of hate and unreason. You remained clear in vision, temperate of speech, loyal to the core. You voted against the war which was a crime against America and its every ideal, and in so doing you kept the American faith. You have kept it ever since. Always you have been the captain of your soul.

And now today, twenty years after your entrance into public life in Washington, you tell us that it is all in vain, that you are laying down your burdens, that you will not return to your constituents seeking anew their votes and their approval. The "system" has conquered you, not by bribes, or by illusions, but by sheer weariness and the force of repeated disappointments. In homely language you declare: "Under the present conditions in Washington and conditions which have existed ever since I came to Congress, it is almost impossible to obtain effective legislation in the interest of the people. I have been bucking this game for twenty years and there is no way of beating it. I've done all I could. Now I'm through." "His lined face," writes the correspondent who took down these words of yours, "his tired eyes, his hair grown white, the resignation of his speech and gesture, all testify to his utter weariness, and his words are almost despairing." We realize how the strain has told; we are aware that you have held your office all these years without any other financial resources than your salary and that this has added enormously to your difficulties and constantly kept you in the background when it would have been to the public welfare had you been free to travel, to speak, and to study. We understand full well the wear and tear of the daily senatorial drudgery upon him who is worthy of the office. We know that the fulness of years approaches—you have passed your sixty-second birthday. And yet, understanding all this, we can but say to you this is no time to flinch.

It is the wrong hour for loss of faith or confession of defeat; the wrong hour to lay down burdens, however they may bind and chafe. For in America the skies are clearing. Everywhere people's eyes are being opened, everywhere there are signs of an awakening to the real costs of the war, a growing appreciation of the wisdom of those who stood against it and have been justified by its total failure to salvage the world and by the destruction of human and moral values which has followed in its train. Everywhere there are indications that the inevitable period of black reaction is drawing to a close, that the tide of liberalism is rising again. Truth is abroad in the land once more and the sober common sense of the plain people of Lincoln is beginning to make itself felt. The day of the fooling of nearly all the people is once more almost at an end. New allies and new friends are sitting at your right and at your left in the chamber you have so long graced. Then why surrender now? To you, Senator, the brightening political skies should be an imperative summons, not to lay down the fight, but to take it up anew.

It was you, George W. Norris, who when a Representative, led the successful fight against Cannonism in the House. If there is a new fight on now against the Congressmen of special privilege, it is, however, true that the conditions today are not as bad as when you led the fray. More than that, political progress means repeated battles and a never-ending series of victories and defeats, as it is the law of our life that each succeeding generation must fight some of our battles over again. Not all; some are won for all time. It was you who led in numerous struggles to better the plight of the farmer you know and understand so well. If his situation is again acute, perhaps more so than ever before, that is no reason for despair and no excuse for retirement from the dust and the heat of the day. On the contrary, it is the very reason why the plume of Richmond should wave above them all. Even if it were failure, as you allege, which moves you to lay down your arms now, why then it is once more necessary to say that not failure but low aim is crime. The aim must be to fight to the very last no matter what the odds. The very worth of your service, the very fidelity with which you have wrought and battled, is the unanswerable reason why you, a patriot of the finest water, should stay in harness until the last. Do you not remember Cyrano de Bergerac? His dying eyes see a thousand foes round about him; his failing rapier thrusts to the end at Prejudice, Hypocrisy, Compromise, Cowardice, Stupidity:

> I know I shall be beaten by your might.
> What matters it! I fight! I fight! I fight!

And there was Terentius Varro, Roman consul. Have you forgotten him? He and his fellow-consul lost their battle to the enemy; his comrade fell. But when Varro returned to Rome with his beaten legions, the populace and the Senate greeted him with acclaim, for, they said, "in the darkest hour he had not despaired of the republic."

If it were in our power, Senator Norris, we should have an outpouring of the populace upon the plaza behind the noblest building in the world, within which you labor. We should have no patricians, no lictors, no centurions, and no pro-consuls in the gathering—only the humblest of our citizens, attired not in garments of ceremony but in the garb of arduous toil. We should have them call you forth and ask that you still serve on. We believe that you would not be able to resist such a call to further service, for you have been of the humble and you have labored for the lowly. For these, until the end of time, must their champions forswear rest and peace and content. We cannot by any magic wand call forth this gathering; we must continue to see it in our mind's eye. But on its behalf we speak its unspoken words: "Thou shalt not despair."

The Case of the Fundamentalists

OUR psychoanalyst friends are having a lot of fun with the Fundamentalist brethren. What repressed desires, what envy and bitterness, find outlet in the zeal with which these Christian soldiers refuse to sit at meat with such enemies of Christ as Dr. Fosdick and sentence to hell all poor sinners who happen to doubt, or not to care, whether Jesus of Nazareth was born of a virgin! Yet such intolerance is not peculiar to religious controversy. A newspaper columnist has suggested that he knows men who would people hell with those who do not reverence the books of Joseph Conrad. Doubtless in private life these Fundamentalist champions of Jehovah who send their enemies to an eternal hell are good neighbors and stern foes of cruelty even to animals. In a world of nationalists, Ku Klux Klans, and embattled labor internationals there is, alas, nothing strange in intolerance.

What gives Fundamentalism its strange savor is its reassertion of the ancient faith that no mundane affair is comparable in importance to eternal salvation and that eternal salvation by fiat of God depends upon the acceptance of His revealed scheme of things. In this conviction the Fundamentalists have the general backing of the church. To be sure, the greatest of the Catholic fathers and Protestant reformers alike would look with suspicion on the Baptist brother who would reduce the essentials of faith to belief in the deity of Christ, his Virgin birth and bodily resurrection. They would also protest against the brethren who would make the ancient faith in the imminent return of the risen Christ an essential dogma of Christianity. Nevertheless, despite some vagaries, in its general conception of God, the universe, and salvation, Fundamentalism is undoubtedly in the main stream of Christian tradition while Modernism represents a religious revolution as far-reaching as the Protestant Reformation.

Those liberals who insist that they are only reinterpreting the essential truths of Christianity in the thought forms of a modern world have to go very far back—back not only to the Gospels but to a critical interpretation of the Gospels—to rid themselves of all those theological dogmas which they reject. In the Baptist church the lack of a rigid creed and the liberty of the individual conscience make the lot of the liberals somewhat easier. But in creedal churches like the Episcopal and the Presbyterian they fight at a certain disadvantage. When the Episcopal bishops say that the doctrine of the Virgin birth is an integral part of the accepted creeds, and should be accepted by the clergy, the statement seems plausible to the layman in the pew and the man in the street. It is not easy to answer such an argument as the Philadelphia convention of Presbyterian Fundamentalists set forth:

> We believe that men should be as free to teach as the winds are to blow. But we also believe that the Presbyterian church is a church whose creed in the most explicit and unmistakable language commits its ministers to certain definite views of Christ and the Scriptures. No men should be ordained to the ministry of the Presbyterian church who cannot cheerfully accept its doctrinal teachings; and to countenance in Presbyterian pulpits a teaching which violates the creed of the church is as contrary to right as it is contrary to common sense.

It is not enough to say in reply that liberals are good men or fine preachers. It is not enough to talk of tolerance. All that may have a psychological effect on the churches; but logically it is necessary to prove that creeds do not mean what they say or are more elastic than they seem. Far be it from us to declare such proof impossible. We are not theologians and our sympathies are with the liberals, but it does seem as if the symbolic and eclectic sense in which Modernists are forced to accept the Bible and the creeds was a decided handicap in the battle before them.

But whatever the difficulties, from the standpoint of sound religion and clear thinking it is well that the battle should be joined and not evaded. The true answer to Fundamentalism, as the Fundamentalists realize, is not a plea for a comprehensive church. It is proof that Fundamentalism is wrong in its understanding of God's plan for salvation. If it is right, not it but God is to blame for the whimsical cruelty with which men are sent to damnation.

And when one begins to speak of God in this universe of ours, not all the questions asked of the Modernists will come from the Fundamentalists. Some there will be who accepting the beauty of the modernist theology will perhaps sorrowfully question its truth, while others will point to the fact that enlightened Modernism has been scarcely more successful in making its believers the uncompromising protagonists of a warless world or of human brotherhood than has rigid Fundamentalism.

The Twilight of a Noble Art

THE New York newspapers, which are making such a hullabaloo over what they call "the recrudescence of banditry," seem to be missing the vital point at issue. It is not the increase in banditry but the deterioration in its quality that is distressing. The profession of highwayman or high-sea man is one of the most ancient and honorable of callings—synonymous with imagination, resource, and courage. The names of famous brigands and pirates and buccaneers have come down to us from centuries whose princes and governors—respectable, house-broken, and uninteresting men—have long since been forgotten. Of course there have always been some bad eggs among bandits—some men who were merely cruel and greedy—but the same is equally true of grocers, parsons, and plasterers. Our best bandits have generally fought fair and sometimes chivalrously. Men like Robin Hood have come to be regarded as positive benefactors.

It is disturbing to turn from this picture of when banditry was in flower to the situation in New York and several other large cities. The newspaper estimates of annual losses through banditry are beside the point. It is doubtful if there is any substantial loss of wealth at all—merely a redistribution of it. As equalizers of wealth bandits are much more successful than income-tax laws or regulation of prices; they are more discriminating in their victims than profiteering landlords, bucket-shops, or real estate swindlers. Yet banditry is at ebb tide for all that. The sad fact is that, like journalism and the stage, it has been commercialized; the soul, the glamor, the joy have gone out of it. Our bandits are no longer men of courage and imagination; they are mere thugs and gunmen. They refuse to take a chance—or to give their victims one. They run no more risk than bankers or bootleggers. A once noble and gallant profession has been reduced to a sordid twentieth-century business. It ought forthwith to be admitted to our chambers of commerce and boards of trade.

Apparently the only hope for banditry is to do with it as we are doing with the stage—to revivify it through importations from abroad. For the fine traditions of the profession still persist in Europe. We read with pleasure the other day of how Mucha, the illustrious Polish bandit, was living up to his duties as a citizen and a taxpayer. He made out an itemized income-tax return, giving the date and place of each robbery during the year, with the amount realized in each case, and sent the statement to the proper public officials with the sum due. He did not even charge off anything for depreciation or dependents.

Then there is Romanetti, the popular brigand of Corsica. In the recent senatorial election in the island both the candidates—François Coty, the manufacturer of perfumes, and Adolphe Landry—sought the brigand's aid, but he stoutly maintained that it was beneath his dignity as a gentleman and a robber to take sides. The night before the election the police surrounded the Grand Hotel in Ajaccio, the capital of Corsica, saying that they had come to arrest Romanetti, but in the morning they searched the hotel without finding the bandit. Coty was elected. Landry then charged that his rival had ordered the display of police to make the natives think their hero was in conference with the perfume-maker. Coty replied that the police demonstration was to prevent him from communicating with his lieutenants. Whereupon Romanetti wrote to the Paris newspapers declaring that he had had nothing to do with the election, although offered 50,000 francs by one of the candidates. Naturally no clean-handed bandit would soil his fingers with politics.

The Woman Without a Country

> If a female citizen of the United States marries a British subject she retains her American nationality and becomes a British subject under British law. If . . . a female British subject marries a United States citizen she becomes stateless.

UNTIL something over a year ago alien women living in the United States could become citizens in three ways: they could remain unmarried and qualify for naturalization; they could marry a citizen; they could marry an alien who became naturalized and acquire citizenship through his act. Unmarried, they were as free to choose as men. Married, they were as helpless as babies. They might live here a lifetime and learn the Constitution by heart, but never, never could they acquire citizenship unless they were married to a citizen. On the other hand they might have reasons for not swearing allegiance to the country of their adoption—willy-nilly they became citizens if they were married to a citizen. American women followed their husbands with the same choiceless submission, and lost their citizenship by the act of marrying an alien.

And so a bill was passed, without any discussion, making the citizenship of women independent of their marital status. American women were to keep their citizenship if they chose, though they married foreigners; alien women must acquire citizenship just as men do—except that a woman marrying a citizen need prove only one year of residence in the United States to be naturalized.

It is easy to pass laws but it is hard to eliminate the chances of personal tragedy resulting from them. Enough misery accumulated under the old law to wipe it off the books, but the new law has its tragedies as well. One of them, a case of flagrant, vicious cruelty to young Anna Lerner, American in every but a technical sense, is told in detail on page 727. And other cases are piling up. Foreign women come here ignorant of our laws, unused to the idea of an independent status. Their husbands are likely to get out into the current of American life and in time to be naturalized. The women, left to themselves, are most unlikely to. And so, though the law has transformed them into the equals of men, they become in fact unequal before the law. The Woman's Trade Union League in reviewing this situation says:

> In a question of separation, financial transaction, divorce and custody of children, the wife's case against the husband is that of an alien against an American citizen. Should the naturalized husband want to rid himself of his wife he has only to persuade her to leave the country on a visit. Her return is that of an alien and therefore problematical. . . . In time of war the father and children may live under the protection of the American flag, while the wife, if an enemy alien, is open to camp detention or deportation.

And not only may an immigrant married woman who fails to become naturalized forfeit the protection of our flag; she may have no other protection. In the course of a recent conference of the British International Law Association devoted to the discussion of the nationality of married women, Dr. Ernest Schuster, a leading English authority, made the statement quoted at the beginning of this article. His concern was with the status of British women married to Americans. Neither here nor in Great Britain have they any legal nationality or any citizenship rights. To the British authorities the Englishwoman married to an American is American and is treated as such, but the United States disowns her. This situation obtains in most countries, although a few have passed laws making it possible for a woman marrying a foreigner to retain her original nationality if under the law of the husband's country she does not acquire his nationality. The complications which may arise where women have no such protection, especially in matters of travel or immigration, are manifold; and decidedly more painful than those of the American woman married to an Englishman, who can claim the privileges of British subject and of American citizen wherever she may go. In 1922 a joint committee of both houses of Parliament in England was appointed to look into the proposal to adopt the American law, but it appears to be indefinitely deadlocked. It is to be hoped that the difficulties which have cropped up under our new system will not discourage other countries from a change which would have the advantage of ending the anomolous situation now existing between them and the United States, as well as equalizing the status of men and women. The International Woman's Suffrage Alliance has already proposed a general adoption by all countries of the principle that a woman's nationality should be determined without respect to her marital status; this would wipe out the present international difficulties. In the United States a vigorous campaign should be set on foot by labor organizations and social agencies of all sorts to make the position of alien women clear to them.

Finally, should not the United States take the lead in calling an international conference, to adopt, if possible, some uniform principles in establishing nationality? We have international codes in regard to navigation, postal service, and the like. Why not in regard to citizenship?

When We Americans Dine

A Symposium on the Great American Dinner

(On October 17 we commented editorially on an "American dinner" that was served to Mr. Lloyd George in the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel. In our next issue there was a spirited criticism of this editorial by the Drifter, and thereafter the rain of correspondence which poured into the office suggested that the subject had aroused more interest and passion among our readers than the occupation of the Ruhr, the price of coal, or the shortcomings of the administration at Washington. So we referred the controversy to several of the authors of articles in our series on These United States, with the request that they would serve the readers of The Nation with a home dinner typical of their section of the country. They responded enthusiastically; dinner is served.)

The Supremacy of Beefsteak

By WILLIAM ALLEN WHITE

AMERICAN cooking is in general bad—both public and private. But at that it is better than English cooking. Domestic science taught in the schools and colleges has helped only a little; too often making our cooking decorative, inept, and given to fruit salads, boiled mayonnaise, paper frills, and striped ice cream. But good American dinners may be had in any community. In every town or village is always at least one righteous woman who can cook. And yet whole sections of the land, groups of States, have not one professional man cook worth naming, and no hotel cook who has either distinction or even rudimentary capacity to fry sour apples!

The American dinner typically is seasonal and served somewhat in the degree of familiarity with which the guest is known. In summer an American dinner would contain fried or broiled spring chicken and strawberry shortcake—made with actual shortening. After the strawberries go, comes corn on the cob, blackberry cobbler or green apple dumpling—American dishes of excellence to go with the young chicken. When young chickens become passé, turkey appears with its trimming; and then pie—pumpkin pie, apple pie, or mince pie—is part of the typical American dinner, and the glacé sweet potato, the parsnip, and the rutabaga. Of course ice cream, which of late years has been universally over the earth served, is rather typically American.

Now all this is the company dinner; the dinner for the stranger guest. But when he has been in the house for a week, or if he is a dear and trusted friend, he is served with a beefsteak of parts and consequence—cut two inches thick, broiled "rare," and served with sauce or without it. The beefsteak is American. It is one of the things which may be found in American homes served better than in public—that is in homes where discerning Americans live. A beefsteak is the most American of our dishes. No other nation knows it—this big, thick, rare, four-pound, T-bone steak, seared over on each side and broiled slowly after the searing without anything in the pan—no grease, no water, no foolish condiments. It is not regional. It is as accessible in Seattle as in Palm Beach. But a good beefsteak is the same on every American table. Around it any dinner that is built scientifically becomes rather keenly American. But it is not the "company" dinner. That clusters around fried chicken, roast turkey, baked ham, or some sectional sea food.

No man ever gets a typical American dinner at a New York hotel. The better the hotel, the less likely one is to get an American dinner and the worse it will be when it is served. Our best hotel cooks have the European tradition. Their American accent is always bad.

À La Maryland

By H. L. MENCKEN

EATING is no longer practiced as a fine art in Maryland. There are, in fact, not three public eating-houses in the whole State where decent victuals are still to be obtained, and even in private houses there has been a melancholy falling off in my time. Prohibition, of course, is to blame. The old-time Maryland gentry are not rich; in the main they can't afford to buy wines and liquors at the current bootlegging prices. So they cease to entertain, for they can no more imagine inviting a civilized guest to a dry dinner than they can imagine putting him to bed with the hogs.

For many years there was a standard Maryland dinner, served with few variations on all festal occasions, public or private. It began with olives and celery, proceeded to a plate of thin soup (usually mock turtle), then to Chesapeake Bay oysters on the half-shell, then to terrapin in the Maryland style, then to roast wild duck, and then to some modest sweet or ice, and coffee. Sometimes a salad was added. If so, it consisted of hearts of lettuce with thin slivers of Maryland country ham; the dressing was always olive oil and vinegar—much more vinegar than oil. The terrapin, always served with terrapin eggs, was stewed in Madeira; the vile cream sauces favored in New York were absolutely unknown. The duck was served bleeding if the guests were New Yorkers, but rather well done if they were cultivated Marylanders. The oysters were always large; no Marylander ever ate a small oyster. The only condiment put upon them was a drop of lemon juice.

With this dinner there went an invariable program of alcoholic beverages. Cocktails were very seldom served; the first drink was almost always a glass of dry sherry. With the terrapin came champagne and with the duck some sound red wine, usually a heavy Burgundy. With the coffee came a liqueur—almost always fine brandy. The highly flavored and scented liqueurs were never served save when harlots were present. After dinner it was proper to put a bottle of Madeira on the table, or, failing that, port.

Such dinners are now only dreams. Prohibition has extinguished them, save in the homes of profiteers. Even the profiteers, alas, can't bring back the past. The Chesapeake Bay oyster has been going downhill for a dozen years past, canvas-back ducks have become extremely scarce, and genuine diamond-back terrapins are almost unobtainable. The Marylander of today eats the common fodder of the republic. Like all other Americans, he has been ironed out.

Where Pie Is King

By DON C. SEITZ

NEW England does not run to course dinners in the ordinary daily fare. The housekeeper usually "contrives" one dish with trimmings. Certain days have a specified menu. Thursday, for example, is the day of the "boiled dinner." This consists of a considerable piece of corned beef cooked with turnips, beets, carrots, and cabbage—plenty of "rubbage," it will be observed. Dinner is a noon, not an evening meal. Supper is light except on Saturday evening, when baked beans and brown bread are insisted upon. If there is company, in fall when the porkers are ripe, this bill of fare may be accepted as perfect:

Baked beans
Roast Spare ribs
Baked potatoes
Biscuit and butter
Pumpkin pie Apple pie
Indian pudding
Tea

Indian pudding is a delicious compound of corn meal and molasses, served with cream. Pie is the universal dessert and adorns most meals, including breakfast, north of a line running from Bellows Falls, Vermont, to Portland, Maine. For Friday, fish chowder is the dinner dish. It is best made from cunners, a fish with firm, sweet flesh, frequenting the rockbound bays of Maine. The chowder is embellished with round "Boston crackers" split in half. Pie and coffee in large cups, with milk, completes the repast. "Broiled scrod"—haddock or young cod cut across the grain—is a favorite breakfast dish. Codfish tongues with pork scraps is another. Portland will not eat flounders, our own filet de sole. There they are "mudfish." Salt codfish is an important item of food. Boiled with beets and served with pork scraps (cubes of salt port fried brown), it is considered delectable. If any is left over, it can be chopped fine and "het up" for breakfast as "red flannel hash." Doughnuts and coffee go with every breakfast, as well as pie. For a supper, ginger cookies and tea serve. The pie allowance for a well-regulated Maine family of five is twenty-one per week!

When Company Comes in Tennessee

By E. E. MILLER

A TENNESSEE dinner, in October, for a welcome guest—a farm dinner, of course, since city dinners, like cities themselves, trend away from the individual and toward standardization.

Country dinners shape themselves around one central dish, and at this season that dish is foreordained. Fried chicken it must be—not the little spring chicken, the creature of a few ounces and a few mouthfuls, but a lusty, coop-fed fellow at the limit of frying size, each drumstick a juicy and satisfying portion, each piece of breast flake after flake of tender whiteness. He is fried just to a golden hue, the skin crisp but not crackly, piled piece upon piece into a great pyramid on a broad platter, choice of cuts and abundant second helpings for all. We give the preacher fried chicken when he comes, or Cousin Dave from the next county; it is what we should give a prime minister if he came; for in all the length and breadth of this lavish land there is nothing better to give.

On one side of the master-dish waits the plate of boiled ham—disks of piquant pink tastiness that quicken appetites anew. On the other, the big bowl of gravy and the yellow, syrupy sweet potatoes—who has not eaten chicken gravy and sweet potatoes has something yet to live for.

Butter beans, too, and okra steaming hot, and scarlet tomatoes crisp and cool. Hot biscuits, inevitably—soft, thick, fluffy biscuits that divide at a touch and melt on the tongue, never a crust about them, only a hint of brown on top and bottom. Rivaling them, brittle corn sticks into which the butter fairly flows.

And jellies—that glass of royal wine-color is blackberry jelly; that clear red is apple; that shimmering gold is peach. More jellies than we can get around to, but our hostess, in wholesome pride, may offer us along with them preserves of equally varied colors and equally intriguing flavors.

We countrymen do not care much for the courses with which dinners may begin. Fried chicken is for us a good enough beginning; but dessert there must be, and the dessert of apple-ripening season is prince of them all. Long before it comes into sight tantalizing fragrances drift in to us from the kitchen, and when it appears every eye brightens and every nostril widens. Apple dumplings? The winiest-flavored apples fresh from the orchard, gently baked and slowly simmered a long, long time in a deep earthen dish, a garment of flaky crust about them, sugar and butter and the spices of Araby in their hearts. We pour over them a sauce of liquid sunshine and the dinner rises to its ecstatic conclusion.

Preacher, prodigal, visiting cousin, revered celebrity from distant lands—the guest has been well fed.

In the Creole Capital

By BASIL THOMPSON

THE American dinner to my untutored palate is as much a mystery, and will, I blush to confess, remain so, as tatting or Miss Stein's "Tender Buttons." But here, down in "Ny Orl'ns," it is a pleasant task to catalogue the victuals and vintages (in the French ménage of means and a cellar this latter item is still featured) that find their way into the anatomy. You are, we will say, a modest fellow of some importance. You have been invited to dine at the home of a prominent Creole family. If your host is a gentleman and a pirate, and he is usually both, an ojen, a Martini, or a Sazerac cocktail (he will assure you if the last is proffered that his man mixes them with a skill equal to that of the head bartender at the old Royal Street establishment) is thrust under your nose and you sip not unreluctantly thereof. Perhaps he is well stocked and plies you with another; and perhaps a third, in which event dinner takes on color. You are properly placed. The stage—beg pardon, the table—is set. The man, a sepia-toned old South Senegambian, yassahs and 'scuse-me's in the best tradition. Is it oysters on the half shell or shrimp cocktail? Either is right. Is it crayfish bisque or consommé of fowl or mock turtle (not gumbo at a course dinner)? It is soup in any event. Hors d'œuvres? Well, as you will, from stuffed olives to paté de foie gras. Fish? Broiled pompano, sheepshead à la Normande, snappers. With the arrival of the entrée, if your host is true to form, a pirate and a gentleman, you have had with your soup, sherry; with your fish, white wine; and are beginning to feel—well, just a bit drowsy; full is more like it. You glance indifferently at your filet mignon bordelaise and demi-julienne spuds, or Mallard and stuffed egg-plant, or veal roast and candied yams. You eye suspiciously the vin ordinaire, recalling some unpleasant adventure with the red ink of today or last night, literally. You positively sniff at the salad: alligator pear or water cress (de cresson de fontaine) or head lettuce with French dressing. You are sick if a pastry, or sherbet, or charlotte russe, or some other delicacy is shoved before you. Only your café noir and cognac hold any allurement now, and these in the medicinary sense. Pousse café, bah! Suississe, out! You totter from the board bloated, taut, sweating. You swear a terrible oath under your beard and smirk painfully at a pink gargoyle somewhat suggesting your hostess.

God be thanked, mother doesn't lay it on after this fashion. With mother now it's like this—Soup: tomato, vegetable, gumbo crêole, oyster stew on "Fridays and days of abstinence." Fish: now and then. Entrées: lamb or pork chop, veal roast, roast beef. Vegetables: cauliflower with butter sauce, spinach with toast, corn fritters, egg-plant, asparagus with drawn butter, snap beans, butter beans, red beans, cow peas, green peas, squash cakes, corn on the cob, stuffed tomatoes, potatoes in variety—but not all at once; in season, my dear. Everything in season. Salad? Well, head lettuce, alligator pear, sliced tomatoes. Dessert: apple meringue, bread pudding, peaches and cream, figs in their time, watermelon, or fruit etceteras, brought up with a fine syrupy demi-tasse, brewed and dripped by Nancy Johnson in the famous manner. And the estimable lady next door doubtless has her own ideas on the subject. Monsieur Alciatore, proprietor of Antoine's restaurant, has his ideas also. And also Madame Begué's anonymous successor, and the anonymous successor to Monsieur Maylie's thriving establishment. Ferd Alciatore of the Louisiane, the Galatoire Frères, and Count Cazenave of Le Foyer du Gourmet, have theirs, too. The American dinner? New Orleans answers we eat as we must, or please, or please to please.

What Alabama Offers

By CLEMENT WOOD

THE private households of moderate means in Alabama are of two classes: first, the Negro field cabins and the mountain and mill-town white houses; second, the more prosperous white and Negro families. The typical dinner for the Negro field or furnace hand, and the white mill hand or mountaineer, would be about the same:

Sow-belly (fat white pork)
Turnip greens and pot liquor (the latter the water in which the greens are cooked)
String beans, snap beans, boiled onions, or some other cooked vegetable in season
Corn pone (baked of corn-meal, salt, and water)
Coffee, with "long sweetening"—or molasses

You need not ask for the soup, fish, or dessert courses. There are none. For the rare dinner of state, there might be fried chicken, or possum "an' taters."

In the more prosperous families you will get the most opulent meal that I have yet encountered in America. Leave soup for thin souls, and fish for the seaboard; although, of course, Mobile would specialize in "Kubeyon," properly spelled "Court Bouillon" (baked redfish with a thick Creole tomato sauce), alternating with broiled pompano. The ordinary home dinner, with a respected relative or a guest present, would be something like this:

Fried young chicken
Beaten biscuits and corn pone
(An eccentric addition would be persimmon bread or sweet potato bread)
Stewed okra. Turnip greens
Mashed yams with pecans and cream
Rice
Coffee with cream
Fig preserves. Crab-apple jelly. Quince preserves
Garden tomatoes, with sugar and vinegar
Ambrosia, or Syllabub
(Ambrosia is equal parts of orange, pineapple, and cocoanut, served in orange baskets; syllabub is whipped cream, sweetened and flavored with vanilla)
Lady Baltimore cake
(Before Volstead's day, scuppernong or muscadine wine would be added; with a mint julep before the meal. A homelier dessert would be molasses pie, with molasses biscuits for the children)

Compared to such a meal, or to barbecued lamb, or gamey Southern venison, the boiled New England dinner is as tasteless as the realism of Henry James.

The "Dutch" Tradition

By REGINALD WRIGHT KAUFFMAN

THERE being, happily, no such thing as a typical American, it follows that there can be no typical American dinner. I think of Connecticut's oyster-stuffing for turkey as a little more alien than garlic used to be, and I'm sure that Connecticut would consider my scrapple of doubtful patriotism. Therefore, I may but contribute to The Nation's symposium the menu of such a dinner as average Pennsylvanians of moderate means "get up" when they want to dine—as on a Sunday afternoon—rather well and altogether "natively":

Fruit Salad
Roast Ribs of Pork, Apple Sauce, Mashed Potatoes, Sauerkraut, and Real Beer
Mince Pie (laced, not with brandy, but moonshine whiskey), and Cheese
Coffee Some smuggled liqueur

Dining in New Mexico

By ELIZABETH SHEPLEY SERGEANT

THE New Mexican, like other Americans, orders his life with reference to eating. Among the Pueblos religion itself, as Frank Cushing once said, is an insurance against future meals, and I have never fared more hospitably in the pleasant land of France than in this arid corner of our country, where the very cattle are scrawny and athletic like the cowboys, and every scrap of vegetable food—save the nuts and sunflower seeds and wild grasses and cactus fruit, the wild currants and plums which the aboriginal inhabitants used exclusively until the development of corn—has to be won, not only by the sweat of the brow, but by the most cunning ditching, terracing, and entreating of scanty waters. In discussing the real American dinner, I must, however, present three menus: Indian, Spanish-American, and plain United States.

Dinner is the evening meal in the Pueblo country—usually there are only two—and when you enter a house in the pueblo of Zuni, for instance, you are always greeted: "Enter, sit and eat!" The repast is set out on the earth floor before the three-cornered fireplace in decorated pottery bowls, the family, probably ten or twelve people of several generations, squatting around it. So long as the chief males or guests of the family are not there, nobody begins to eat. When all are gathered, every person, including the children, selects a morsel of every kind of food, breathes on it, and says this "grace": "Receive, (oh, souls of) my ancestry, and eat; resuscitate by means of your wondrous knowledge, your hearts; return unto us of yours the water we need, of yours the seeds of earth, of yours the means of attaining great age." With this the offering is thrown on the fire and the meal begins. Cushing's first name as a real Zuni, He-Who-Eats-From-One-Bowl-With-Us-With-One-Spoon, is indicative of Zuni table manners. Nowadays the guest is likely to be offered a metal spoon and white cup, and granite-ware coffee pots and iron frying pans prevail. But en famille, the one earthen spoon, the gourd dipper floating on top of the olla are common, and the food in the bowl is much as it has always been.

Infallibly a stew of meat joints and another of frijoles (succulent brown beans) seasoned with plenty of chile colorado (red pepper meal), onion, and salt, and probably some spicy herb. For a relish, if there are guests, stuffed sheep intestines or a skewer of broiled meat, or a blood pudding—close to the French boudin—cooked in a large intestine. For vegetables, "in season," fried or roast or baked squash, boiled pumpkin, green corn on the cob. For bread—a most important item—he'we or wafer bread, something like our dry breakfast foods in consistency, made by cooking a thin paste of red or blue or yellow corn meal on a hot stone and then rolling it. Sometimes puffy little brown loaves of wheat flour as well, baked in the round outdoor oven of sun-dried brick, common to both Indian and Spanish villages. In the melon or peach seasons there is an abundance of juicy fruit, and dried melon rind is often baked in a sort of tart as an extra delicacy. But on the whole the Indian meal is without sweets.

Now let us approach a Spanish house in a mountain valley not occupied by descendants of the Conquerors, but by simple "Mexican" people. If the family is alone, we shall be welcomed to little but frijoles, a bowl of chile, red or green, and a pile of tortillas—a sort of pancake of white flour browned on top of the stove—and a pot of coffee, brewed and rebrewed. In the corner is a sack of piñon nuts—a tiny nut which is taken into the mouth in quantity and cracked with the teeth, the shells being ejected from one corner of the lips while the rich kernel is still being chewed. There will perhaps be another sort of flat pancake of blue meal, served in layers with red chile sauce between, or rice cooked with onion and chile. On feast days there will surely be a rich sweet chocolate drink, white bread baked in the round ovens, chile con carne (with meat), bread pudding soaked in spiced syrup, stewed dried apricots or peaches, a custard with bananas in it. The Mexicans are charmingly ready to share their last tortilla and their fiesta goodies with American neighbors, but a Spanish servant lass, brought up to abstemiousness at home, eats less than the proverbial mouse in the rancher's house. "What pigs they must think us!" said one of my white neighbors.

The bountiful American farm dinner in my valley is not so different from that of New England. Fried or roast meat, several kinds of excellent vegetables, macaroni baked in a glass dish—for the mail-order houses keep us up to date—preserves of various rich species, flaky hot biscuits, pie, coffee, and cheese. The American rancher would scorn to borrow recipes from the Pueblos, but tortillas, "Spanish rice," and chile are not unknown to his table. If there is one article of diet common to all races in New Mexico, it is this same chile colorado, which hangs in flaming strings from the roof beams against the red brown walls of the houses, like the flag of an exotic civilization. Chile keeps the palate keyed up to the climate and the mountains: it is a spice of the devil to counteract the dominant presence of God on the peaks.

For the Indian's Sake

Washington, December 14

On behalf of the American Indian a majority of the committee of one hundred citizens recently appointed by Secretary Work met at the Department of the Interior in Washington on December 11 and 12 to discuss and debate. The Secretary welcomed them and asked their advice and their criticisms of the Indian Bureau. The Indian Commissioner was equally frank in requesting the judgment of the committee upon his work, and the Board of Indian Comsioners was well represented in what was, in its personnel, a truly remarkable gathering of the friends of the Indian. It was no slight achievement to have brought into one room men and women of the caliber of General H. L. Scott, W. J. Bryan, Herbert Welsh, John Collier, Bernard M. Baruch, Warren K. Moorehead, Mary Roberts Rinehart, Mary W. Roe, Edith N. Dabb, Margaret McKittrick, Maud Wood Park, and Mrs. H. A. Atwood of California, together with many distinguished representatives of the various missionary activities. That there were discordant elements here represented everybody knew. The best achievement of the conference was that the discussions were conducted in excellent spirit, despite the infliction of the most incompetent and bemuddling chairman who ever presided over any such gathering, and that as they progressed many differences were ironed out. In the case of the Pueblo Indians, for instance, the very mention of whom at the outset of the conference sent cold shivers of apprehension down every spine, there came about a nearer approach to a union among the friends of these people than had seemed possible. Secretary Work may not have had in mind a welding of the reform forces as a primary purpose of this gathering but it seemed none the less to tend in that direction.

Not that it reconciled all the divergencies of opinion. These will doubtless last as long as there remains an Indian to be helped. For, where it is not a question of the correct technique of aiding them, as in the case of the Pueblos, the divergencies are due to varying philosophies of life and conceptions of democracy. That was strikingly illustrated in some of the debates which brought out with disheartening clearness how superficial is the democracy of many Americans. Mr. Bryan spoke well on behalf of the Indians' fundamental right to citizenship and the ballot, but the same old arguments advanced against the enfranchisement of Negroes and of women were heard once more. General Scott was, for example, deeply concerned lest the "buffalo

Indians," who are too ignorant to use the ballot and do not want it, should have it forced upon them. For their sakes he was willing that the competent and educated Indian should continue to have to face the existing difficulties in attaining the full stature of a free American where he can attain it at all. Every effort to set a limit to the functions and existence of the Indian Bureau met with stout opposition. In fact, only in one matter, the question of the health of the Indian, was there a clear-cut advance; the recommendations for improved medical service, for nurses and matrons, and for larger appropriations were unanimously and enthusiastically adopted. What is more important, the conference demanded an emergency appropriation of $100,000 for combating the three worst diseases, and urged an immediate investigation of the entire health situation by the National Health Council.

For the rest, whenever the conference came to thin ice, it skated carefully around it or else took off its skates and retraced its steps to dry land. Surely nothing could have been more humiliating than the conference's submission to Secretary Work (to whom all its resolutions were directed) of the two motions in regard to the Pueblos, the one favoring the Lenroot bill, the other opposing it. That so able a body could not bring itself to ascertain its majority mind upon this subject must have caused Mr. Work some amusement. This vital topic, the debates as to which aroused the whole country last winter, was thus left practically untouched.

Similarly astonishing was the failure of the conference to adopt Mr. John Collier's resolution that the business of the Indian Bureau be reported on by the Bureau of Municipal Research and the Bureau of Standards. It would seem as if the members of the conference and the government officials concerned would have jumped at this opportunity to get expert opinion as to the efficiency of the Bureau and of its methods of conducting its business. If the proposition had been one to inoculate every employee of the bureau with the germs of yellow fever the conference could not have shied away from it more emphatically. Even more distressing is the fact that the conference adjourned without any ringing demand that the Indian have equal protection of the law. Mr. Thomas L. Sloan's appeal, as an Indian, that the Indians should have full protection of the courts and that certain lawless procedures of the Indian Bureau should cease made no impression whatever. Everybody who knows the Indian problem knows that the Bureau is inseparably woven into the politics of the country and that each administrative change brings a fresh inoculation of partisan politics. No one would have learned this from the meeting. But gingerly references were made to the retaining in the service of political appointees who, when their unfitness is demonstrated, are usually transferred to another reservation instead of being ousted. General Scott's excellent suggestions for creating a general administrative staff in the Indian Bureau and giving employees definite rank and title, with pay corresponding to that rank as in the army, were unanimously adopted.

As for the religion of the Indian and his dances, there, too, the issue was shirked and there, too, was the same cleavage between the conservatives and the progressives. Mr. Bryan, now a professional religious zealot, was apparently eager to shove the Christian religion down the throats of every Indian, and the effort to cut off all the tribal dances, because some are alleged to be immoral, was much in evidence. The curse of "Americanization" is coming to rest upon the Indians as upon our immigrants. They must be made just like the rest of us in their fear of the future, and they must be stripped of all their tribal customs, culture, beliefs, and arts. If they are not in the course of time made absolutely to conform to the standards of Main Street in Lincoln or Tampa it will not be Mr. Bryan's fault or that of most of the missionaries. Fortunately there were brave and outspoken words against this proposed outrage.

Despite the disappointments of the meeting it more than justified itself. Such a committee is urgently needed, and it would be an excellent thing if Secretary Work could see his way clear to making it a permanent institution with semi-annual meetings.

China's Newest President

By BERT L. KUHN

Shanghai, November 1

ON an appointed day early in October there assembled at Peking, after no little hesitation, a few less than six hundred Chinese gentlemen who were duly accredited as members of the Parliament of China. The legal time for a presidential election had arrived. On the first ballot, Marshal Tsao Kun, former private in the Chinese army and more recently inspector general of the provinces of Chihli, Honan, and Shantung, was given some 480-odd votes and was declared elected. His only opponent, Sun Yat-sen, "President of the Republic of South China," had thirty-three ballots cast for him. Five days later Tsao Kun was in Peking, traveling the paths of the emperors, with all the pomp which the East could provide. Yellow sands were strewn over the highways before him, a custom handed down from imperial days and religiously followed each time a new emperor ascended the Throne of Heaven.

Nominally, Tsao Kun is now president of China. Actually, he occupies precisely the same position as before his election—Dictator of the Central Provinces. How long he will be able to hold on and how much he may extend the authority of the central Government will depend without question on his force of arms. China has not one but several new internal wars hatching.

To obtain any comprehensive idea of the problems which China's new president is called upon to face, one must go back to his early history and the record of events of the past year or two which he so engineered as to place himself in office.

Tsao Kun is and always has been a soldier. Illiterate in his early days and of a caste that was by no means high in the eyes of his nation, he first gained a minor degree of prominence by personal acts of bravery. This led to his appointment to one of China's old-time military academies, from which he was graduated with a petty commission. His subsequent career was that of every prominent Chinese militarist of today. First commander of a brigade, then of a division, he gradually augmented his forces and bound them to him in personal fealty by seeing to it that they were paid as regularly as possible, that they were clothed, and that they were fed. To do this he adopted whatever means seemed to suit him, seizing here and there, levying his own taxes and collecting them, without regard for the Peking Government other than to draw a fine line when it came to interfering with foreign interests.

A commander of the imperial forces in the revolution of 1911, Tsao Kun, when he found that he was allied with a lost cause, joined the forces of the Republicans. His was not an act of submission. It was in every sense an alliance, an agreement to maintain the status quo with those in power at Peking as long as he was left without interference in the territory which he then controlled.

While President Yuan Shih-k'ai, who had also supported the empire and also gone over to the republic, lived this system worked out well enough for both sides. Tsao, expanding his armies ceaselessly, was paving the way toward making himself the one great leader of central China. He was fortunate in his choice of subordinates, two of whom, General Wu Pei-fu, Tsao's "number two," and General Feng Yu-hsiang, who has achieved endless publicity as the "Christian general," are still with Tsao Kun, although efforts have been made in many quarters to sway them from their allegiance. It was Wu who successfully prosecuted the two years of warfare against the Anfuite clique, and again, a year ago last spring, it was he who in three weeks of battle delivered so smashing a defeat to Chang Tso-lin of Manchuria that the latter was forced to withdraw outside the Great Wall and has remained in his own realm ever since.

Last year Tsao Kun was at the height of his power. His armies were victorious everywhere; he had demonstrated convincingly that in the Yangtze valley he was supreme. He could and did make and break presidents. It was through him that Hsu Shih-chang was forced to give up the position which he had so long nominally held as chief executive of the nation. It was through Tsao that Li Yuan-hung was installed at Peking amid great talk of "reunification at last." But Tsao, strong man that he is, has one weakness. He is vain. And thoughts of another being his "superior" galled him. Tsao had lived in the old China. He had seen the glories of the Dragon Throne. When the final test came, vanity conquered. And so Tsao decided to go to Peking.

The actual mode of his entry is common knowledge in China. Once his decision was reached, money was no object. The president, Li Yuan-hung, was unceremoniously ejected and fled first to Tientsin and later to Shanghai, all the time protesting his right to hold office but unable to exert that right. The great seals of office which Li, in his flight, had intrusted to his wife, ill in a hospital in Peking, were snatched by adherents of Tsao. Then the election was called.

Tsao took no chances. Before the electoral college went into session, votes sufficient to put him over were definitely pledged. How these pledges were obtained is illustrated by photographs of checks for $5,000 each, paid by Tsao to various members of Parliament, which have been reproduced in many of the newspapers in Shanghai; a prima facie case of widespread bribery has been clearly made out.

Tsao Kun is president of China, but the China which he will actually govern will be confined to Honan, Shantung, Chihli, and parts of the other Yangtze valley provinces, with minor leaders in some other sections lending him a half-hearted sort of support. Chang Tso-lin, super-tuchun of the three eastern provinces, made plain his stand in the matter long before the actual elections took place. In a statement bristling with stinging adjectives, he denounced the ambition of his old-time rival as outright robbery of the presidential chair. Since the election he has said little, but he has already summoned his troops and mobilized them for a series of "maneuvers," all of which will be held on the very borderline of his domain. That Chang Tso-lin will offer battle eventually is conceded by everyone familiar with the situation.

In Chekiang province Tsao finds another well-organized enemy. General Lu Yung-hsiang, who from his yamen at Hangchow controls the destinies not only of Chekiang but of the military district of Shanghai and Sungkiang, the great ocean outlet for Yangtze trade, both before and after the elections issued statements which clearly show his animosity; and he already has extensive military preparations under way.

Sun Yat-sen, fiery patriot of Canton, although he has his hands full at the present time in his efforts to overcome Cheng Chung-ming, who once drove him out of his capital, has paused long enough in his military campaign to declare open war on Tsao and dispatch long telegrams to Chekiang and the three eastern provinces with a view to forming a tri-partite alliance to oust Tsao. Such an alliance looms as a strong possibility for the spring, and if it is formed and activities are started on all fronts, Tsao is likely to find himself hard pressed.

The attitude of the foreign Powers toward Tsao is still a matter in doubt, although representatives of the legations, including United States Minister Jacob Gould Schurman, attended the election. It is noteworthy that none of the diplomats has, up to the present time, paid the customary courtesy call on the new president. Current reports assign as a reason for this the fact that China has not yet given a satisfactory explanation of the Lincheng bandit outrage, along with the indemnities and guaranties asked by the Powers, and that Tsao Kun, as inspector-general of Shantung at the time of the bandit raid, might be held in a measure responsible for the occurrence and might therefore prove persona non grata with the Powers.

Tsao Kun will not be a popular president. The stigma attached to his election and the bribery of the parliamentarians has already been made much of by his opponents everywhere. Word of his election was received in many sections of the nation with an unusual degree of sorrow and contempt. Mass meetings, in many cases organized and led by returned students, denounced the balloting as the worst case of corruption in China's history.

At Shanghai the day of the inauguration, which also chanced to be the twelfth anniversary of the establishment of the republic and which ordinarily would have been a gay holiday, was given over to a "humiliation-day" program. Flags everywhere were flown at half-mast. Though it had been forbidden by the authorities a mass meeting of 6,000 persons was held and adopted resolutions denouncing the new president and branding his election a national disgrace. Dummy characters portraying the president and members of parliament were paraded before the meeting and were the objects of vicious satirical thrusts.

Just how strongly resentment over the choice of Tsao Kun is being felt elsewhere among the people of China it is impossible to ascertain at this time. Speaking generally, it may be said that the common citizen—coolie, skilled workman, merchant, or tradesman—bestirs himself very little in politics so long as local affairs move on serenely and he is not victimized too frequently by bandits or soldiers. National politics as a general rule concern him little if at all, for, illiterate and unable to comprehend any other China than that which he knows in his own village, he is content to let the self-appointed village, town, and provincial leaders take the initiative when it comes to national politics.

America Worst

By WILLIAM HARD

CONVERSATIONS with foreign diplomats, no matter how discreet, and glimpses into the foreign press, no matter how casual, will bring home to almost any American reporter, I think, the start at least of a burning suspicion that this beloved country of ours, which regards itself as a sort of gentle and winning babe of peace in the manger of the nations, is in fact succeeding with a greater and greater rapidity in getting itself regarded by all these low-down foreign statesmen and editors and bankers and merchants and proletarians as the star-spangled uppish and insufferable habitat of the most offensive outfit on the surface of the globe.

A Japanese diplomat in London once quelled and quenched me with an observation which I fear I may already have quoted a great many times to the readers of The Nation. I find difficulty in keeping it off my mind and tongue.

This diplomat was taciturn beyond all the necessities either of his profession or of his race. He was engaged, when I met him, in illustrating the complexities of London society by making the acquaintance of Irish rebel ladies at the home of a British Foreign Office official. He crept or paced about the drawing-room like a soft-pawed tiger peering through grasses in a jungle. He looked and he listened and he perhaps took what was said and pondered it in his heart but it certainly bore no fruits on his lips. At last my hostess set me upon him with definite and inescapable instructions to cause him to speak.

I approached and presently found myself babbling idly about the climate of Washington, D. C. He listened and he looked and my babbling became idler and shriller while his taciturnity gloomily deepened. At length, however, he spoke. Neglecting and setting totally aside the whole question of the climate of Washington, he suddenly and simply remarked:

"Mr. Hard, your country is a beautiful woman whom no one dares to contradict."

I am proud to remember that I had resourcefulness enough to say "Thank you for not saying 'heiress.'" I then came, however, to the end of my resourcefulness and I retired to the side of my hostess to show her the wound I had gained in her service. It smarts now on numerous occasions, the nature of which I shall indicate, although now a certain part of the point of that Japanese diplomat's epigram is blunted.

Now, the beautiful lady whose lovely home is in Washington, D. C., is not only from time to time considerably contradicted but also even from time to time approached with a demonstration more or less resembling a frank and hearty slap.

When in the name of all that is good and beautiful and true, of which we are the self-authorized supreme expositors, we discourse to the Dutch Government about the great and unselfish principle of equality of opportunity for all humanity in the oil fields of the Dutch East Indies, the Dutch Government does not hesitate to tell us in return that we are talking in fact about the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey and that the reason why that company did not get the Djambi oil field is that its bid was lower and poorer than the bid by the Dutch company which was awarded the prize.

When we aspire to make Mr. Volstead the purser of the British merchant marine, there are numerous rough country squires in the British House of Commons who do not hesitate to jest and jeer at our moral mission toward making the world walk straight instead of whirling round.

When also by an arbitrary one-sided statute of our own we try to destroy the Liverpool cotton-standards arbitration tribunal and to substitute for it without negotiations or understandings a tribunal of our very American own on this side of the ocean we get visited by Liverpool cotton merchants who politely but pertinaciously want to know who we think we are and why.

When a dozen of our States remain in utter acknowledged default on certain foreign-held debts of theirs for decade after decade, and when then we talk in terms of the loftiest international morality to Soviet Russia on the subject of the clinging moral bindingness of foreign-held debts, Moscow now permits itself to laugh not simply in its sleeve but even in its propagandist publicity.

When we demand equality of treatment for our explorers and exploiters and well-diggers and oil-pumpers in the mandated territories wrung from the hateful Hun, there now are not wanting certain European colonial administrators who lift their voices to inquire why we do not also embrace an equality of expense and effort in shooting the natives and otherwise rendering the mandated territories a secure scene for the application of our ideals and the expansion of our exports and imports.

When further, and most particularly exasperatingly, we produce a flock of statesmen who outnumber and outnoise all the other statesmen in the world for bleating and baaing and moaning and caterwauling about helping Europe and helping humanity and helping the universe and meanwhile we are going to collect out of the private property of Germans found in this country the last cent of all legally valid claims of our citizens against the old dead imperial German Government, the world really can scarcely be blamed for beginning to think that we are the most morally wilfully wall-eyed people in the whole human international family.

Even Calvin Coolidge, even that chip of clean cool marble from the marble-hearted State of Vermont, can get melted to a drip of slush by this modernistic American Turkish bath of empty hot moral vapors.

At the end of a long presidential message in which he discusses point after point of public policy without one trace of any sort of emotion and in which he promises Europe not one specific thing except that we will join a world court if we can join it without getting into Europe, he suddenly, having concluded all his recommendations, gives his moral bootstraps a hitch and soars straight off into the open blue sky with two hundred and fifty words of a runaway burning balloon of idealism without a single parachute of any recommendation for action anywhere attached to it.

Idealism, he says, is what we must have; but he does not say what for. Sacrifices, he says, are what we must make;

but he does not say what sacrifices or for whom or why or when. We must help to stabilize the world, he says; but he does not say how. We must speak, he says, with the voices of the world's spiritual forces; but he does not say what it is that those voices say, and his message ends with a sublime evocation of them unaccompanied by the slightest responding squeak from them, themselves.

To apostrophize the morality of the universe and of the United States of America, and to call it a day's work for the world: that is the strange state of mind to which the successors of George Washington and Thomas Jefferson have come.

And I know why they have come to it; and I am willing to share my knowledge with anybody within range of my pen. They have come to it because in these present drippy and foggy, pining and yearning days, we have abandoned the solid realism of our forefathers and have ceased to try to perceive and pursue the actual interests of the United States and have wandered off into talking about the interests of everybody in general and nobody in particular, and we have ended by not being able to perceive and pursue any interests at all. We have passed from being selfishly useful to the world into being idealistically and altitudinously perfectly useless to it. We have passed from America first and international effectiveness into internationalistic rhetoric and America worst.

Why Henry Ford Wants Muscle Shoals

By GEORGE W. NORRIS

United States Senator for Nebraska

I READ with interest The Nation's challenge to Henry Ford to operate Muscle Shoals to make cheap fertilizer for the people, without profit. It is a novel plan. There is no danger, however, of Mr. Ford accepting it. If we were to give Muscle Shoals to anybody, I would just as soon give it to Henry Ford as anyone else. I have never made any personal attack upon him, and I am not moved in my opposition regarding Muscle Shoals by any feeling of animosity or ill-will. He is a man whom in many respects I greatly admire, but I would not give away the heritage of the people even to a saint. I would not be willing to do it even if Mr. Ford could give us a guaranty that he would live for one hundred years—the lifetime of his corporation, which, under his plan, would have the ownership and control of the property. If it were not for his popularity in the country, his proposition would not receive favorable consideration from the hands of anyone.

If Mr. Ford is able to produce nitrates as cheaply as it is claimed he can, there is no reason in the world why he should not at once proceed to do it. It is not necessary that the Government should donate to him millions of dollars' worth of public property in order to have him perform this very much desired thing. If he were a poor man and claimed to have some knowledge that no one else possessed, which he could not transmit to anyone else, and was thus moved by the philanthropic desire to help his fellow-men, there would be some justification for him to come to the Treasury of the United States for funds. But no one can offer in his behalf the claim that he lacks funds to produce nitrates. Muscle Shoals is not the only place in the world where this can be done. There are many other places where there are even better water-power opportunities than at Muscle Shoals. I am very reliably informed that the commission which President Wilson appointed to locate this great plant was opposed to its location at Muscle Shoals, on the ground that there were other places where we could have accomplished the same thing by the expenditure of much less money—but President Wilson took the bit in his mouth and located it at Muscle Shoals because of the influence of a few leading Democrats in the Senate. This may not be true. I have never seen the records. I have it only from those who claim to have seen the records and the presidential report of Mr. Wilson's own commission. It is perhaps not material whether the story is true or not, but it does demonstrate that Henry Ford could go elsewhere if he wants to produce nitrates from the air, and be able to do it cheaper than it can be done at Muscle Shoals.

The facts are that nowhere or at any time has Mr. Ford ever agreed to make any guaranty, either that nitrates could be produced cheap enough at Muscle Shoals to become valuable as a fertilizer proposition or that the corporation which he organizes will not be under the control of Rockefeller or some other Wall Street interest within a very few years after it is turned over to him by the Government.

Mr. Ford's criticism of Secretary Weeks for the sale of the Gorgas plant is without any foundation, without any logic or reason. Anyone who has studied the Muscle Shoals proposition must agree that the Gorgas plant has no more connection with Muscle Shoals than the fifth wheel of a wagon. The reason why the Government put its money into Gorgas and doubled the capacity of that plant, owned by the Alabama Power Company, was to enable it to have power for building operations at Muscle Shoals. It was the nearest place where cheap power could be had. The only object of it all was to secure this power until they obtained power at Muscle Shoals. I can conceive of no sane man entering into the contract that the Government did in building at Gorgas, if it was ever the intention of either party that the Government should permanently own the Gorgas plant. Gorgas is truly a scrambled egg. The Government simply added to the existing plant, a little better than doubling its capacity. The plant is all under one roof, all built on land owned by the Alabama Power Company. The only means of getting coal for its operation is from a mine right at the door, owned by the Alabama Power Company. Other buildings constructed there by the Government, necessary in the full operation of such a large plant, were built on land owned by the power company. This included houses built for the employees to live in. They were not even built in one section of the locality; you would find one cottage owned by the Alabama Power Company, the next one owned by the Government, the third one owned by the power company, and so on.

I do not see how any sane man looking into the question can reach any other conclusion than that the power company had to buy out the Government or the Government buy out the Alabama Power Company. If we decide that the Government should buy out the Alabama Power Company, then we must take into consideration another thing that is absolutely connected with it—that the Alabama Power Company owns a lot of other plants constructed in different parts of the State and that Gorgas is only one of a system all linked up together. They have contracts running over many years with municipalities, corporations, mining companies, and individuals, by which they have agreed to supply electric energy to these various customers. If we should arbitrarily take away Gorgas it would cripple them and make it impossible for them to perform their contracts made with these various municipalities, corporations, and individuals. Therefore, we would be liable for damages unless we carried out the contracts of the Alabama Power Company, and if we carried them out we would have to buy not only Gorgas but every other plant owned by the Alabama Power Company.

Secretary Weeks and I do not agree on most fundamental principles of government. He is opposed to governmental activities of various kinds that I favor; but it seems to me that in the sale of the Gorgas plant he acted wisely and for the best interest of the Government.

When Mr. Ford makes his unjust criticism of Secretary Weeks for this sale, I cannot help accepting the conclusion that he must have some ulterior motive in his desire to acquire Gorgas. If he simply wants to make fertilizer at Muscle Shoals, as he claims, then he has no use for Gorgas; but, on the other hand, if he wants to have a monopoly in that section of the country in the development of hydro-electric power, and wants to use the unusual contract that he demands of the Government by which this property in the hands of his corporation shall be absolutely unregulated either by State or nation, then I can see how he would like to cripple the only competitor he would have in the field. I do not see how one can reach any other conclusion than this one—that his desire to have the Gorgas plant was for the purpose of selling it, just as Weeks has done, to the Alabama Power Company. Under his proposition, his corporation would be required to pay the Government five million dollars for the ownership of property worth nearly one hundred million, and would have the lease of a great water power for one hundred years without any provision for regulation, and he could have made the sale to the Alabama Power Company as the Government did and thus been able to realize almost enough to pay the entire amount which he had agreed to give to the Government. But in any case, it would have left him with all the other valuable property in his hands without the expenditure of very much money. Indeed, there is other property included in his proposition of various kinds, located at Muscle Shoals, belonging to the Government, which is not necessary for the operation of Muscle Shoals, and would readily sell on the market for enough money to make up the balance of his payment, so that he could have sold it and had the entire property at Muscle Shoals absolutely free of any cost. This property consists of railroad engines, railroad cars, lumber of all kinds, and immense quantities of building materials, all in first-class condition and practically all of which has a stabilized market price.

I would be glad to help Mr. Ford or anybody else, if I could honorably do so as a government official, to make cheap nitrates. If he would make a proposition and select his place where there is cheap water power anywhere in the United States and guarantee in the contract that the power utilized would be used for the production of fertilizer, I should be willing to give him a location. But I would not be willing to go into the Treasury of the United States for money to pay for its development and give him that also.

Impressions

By WILBERT SNOW

These entered into me and shaped my dreams:
The full, triumphant buoyance of flood tide;
A wooded cove streaked with the low moon's beams;
A little island where white seagulls cried
My drowsiness astir, and perched to ride
With schooners that indulged the wind's desire;
Calm spots on choppy seas; an ocean-wide
Northeaster rousing moods that issued higher
Than pushing waves; the reminiscent fire
In eyes of sailors who had ploughed the main
On full-rigged ships where mutinies and dire
Atlantic gales from Montreal to Spain
Had filled them with adventure glowing bright
As brass rings through their ears in sunset light.

In the Driftway

THE Christian church has lately been much in the public eye. There is the group of preachers, headed by the Bishop of New York, which is scandalized by the immorality of certain plays and dances; there is the Executive Committee of the Modern Churchmen's Union which expresses doubts about the Virgin birth; there are the Fundamentalists insisting on heaven as their very own prerogative; and finally there is the combination of church and bank building which is presently to be erected in New York City. As for the latter, the Drifter saw a much finer and grander example of the same combination in Chicago last summer, a veritable Woolworth tower with the church up on top and maintaining its exalted position, doubtless, on the rents from the offices beneath its heel. The Drifter scorns to make the obvious remark about the money changers in the temple, though it does seem apt. Instead, he is glad to offer a remedy for the church's difficulties; a return to the simpler days of the past!

* * * * *

THE church, like other time-honored institutions in the present day, is suffering from the results of the industrial revolution. It has too much money, too many members, too large buildings, and it pays its ministers too high salaries. The Drifter hereby announces that he will print no letters from ministers proving that $1,400 a year is not too much for a man with a wife and seven children! With the proletariat he is not at the moment concerned. The church, he repeats, is too rich and too great; large-scale production and attempted monopolistic control is going to be the ruin of it, and justly so. And it is trying along with its greatness, to do too many things. Time was when the church sought to dispense the bread of life only; now that it has gone in for baking entertainment cake and pleasure pie on a large scale it is competing with institutions that have been in the business a long time and know it better. No, the Drifter is all for the good old days; then religion was religion and if you did not go to church you were birched and that was all there was to it; nor was amusement provided to make the two-hour sermon any easier to sit upright through.

* * * * *

OF course, the old days were not all spent in birching, as a recent item in the Manchester Guardian may indicate. The late Dr. Emil Reich, at the opening of a cookery exhibition in London some years ago, declared: "In Protestant countries cooking is much worse than in Catholic countries. The reasons are simple. In Catholic countries there is a distinct set of people, monks and the inhabitants of monasteries, who have long made a specialty of good eating and drinking. Their life used to be devoted very largely to that purpose. Where in any country there were specialists who studied nothing but how to eat and drink well, there, it stood to reason, the people would learn of them. In Protestant countries there was no such set of people. Everybody was in a hurry making money all day long. . . ." Which, as the Drifter said above, is what ails the church. Too much money, a too intricate management, too many interests, above all, an attempt to reconcile religion and daily living. The birchers who insisted on nothing but religion, and the eaters, who were preoccupied so largely with the flesh, never did this. They could take their religion or leave it alone, but they did not attempt to do both at once. When the modern church is as wise, it will not only solve its problems but it may even gain a convert in

Shall We Do Nothing?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Major General Henry T. Allen, running true to his fearless form, has accepted the onerous leadership in the cause of common humanity to stay stalking famine as it threatens to destroy the lives of helpless men, women, and children in Germany today.

These are as much the victims of a cruel war as were the millions who fell before fighting guns. The aftermath of peace is a hideous mockery to these innocent sufferers.

The war was not brought on by them. The terms of peace were not of their making. The intricate questions of international debts and of national capacity to pay do not enter into their lives. The legality or the illegality of the occupation of their territory is not discussed.

Empty stomachs do not indulge in words. They become articulate through action. All these people know at present is that they are hungry, that their children are dying for want of milk, that the sick and feeble can no longer hope for sustenance, that even the daily rations of black bread and soup are rapidly becoming unattainable, that the conditions of the Near East are now the conditions of the Nearer West—and yet in the face of all this appalling calamity our great country, in which the barns are more than filled with plenty, is standing by literally callous to the appeal and skeptical as to its veracity. General Allen knows whereof he speaks and his statements would be more than upheld could we but read the contents of the mail bags arriving each week from Germany.

America has always been just and eternally generous. No nation has ever turned to us for food that has not been fed. No nation has ever asked us for raiment that has not been clothed. Therefore, are we at this crisis to be once again loyal to our great heart or are we to stuff partisanship cotton into our listening ears?

Shall we do nothing while the voices of little children are piteously crying for bread and while the old and feeble are appealing for those crumbs which are falling from our own tables of prosperity?

As a 100 per cent American, without one drop of German blood in my veins, I wish to urge the immediate support of the efforts of Major General Allen, and I beg those who read this letter to remember the white crosses in the cemeteries of France and to realize that our soldiers who laid down their lives would be the first to give their approval in the nobility of their souls to this human movement freed from all political bias or partisanship.

In the name of mercy and of God's charity let us help those who need it!

Will Gandhi Die in Jail?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I have received letters from India telling me that Mahatma Gandhi is far from well. He now weighs less than one hundred pounds, and although he is cheerful long confinement has seriously affected his health.

It is desirable that some effort be made by those who admire Mahatma Gandhi and his teachings of non-violence to urge the British Government to release him as soon as possible.

There is no reason to believe that the British Government will release him unless international public opinion is mobilized to force the issue. British public opinion is not much concerned with Gandhi. British statesmen think that as long as they can, by making concessions to the Turks, keep the Mohammedan world contented, British rule in India is safe. The British Government prefers the sword of Kemal Pasha to the invincible arms of Gandhi—the power of folded arms and dependence upon the spiritual force of non-cooperation; so Gandhi lies in jail and none among the British statesmen pays attention to it.

The Christian world seems dead, so far as its spiritual power is concerned. It pays no attention to the fact that the man who, according to Mr. Sherwood Eddy of the international Y.M.C.A., has demonstrated the life most nearly like that of Christ, is now rotting in jail. It is a credit to the Indian Christians that they asked for Gandhi's release. May I not ask all other Christians who see the hope of the world in an assertion of Christ's spirit to appeal both to the King of England and to Earl Reading, Governor General of India (who belongs to the oppressed Jewish people), and to request that they make use of their power and sense of decency and release Gandhi before it is too late?

Liberty and Last Year's Bird Nests

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Having read with interest Mr. William Hard's article defending the "progressivism" of Hiram Johnson, I would like to ask why it is not possible to measure "progressivism" once in a while by some such easy fundamental as adherence to the people's side of political questions, instead of the side taken by property and the propertied few. There are other things than tariff to measure "progressivism." Of course not many of our so-called progressives measure up to fundamental standards. A general sympathy with the majority of the people ought to make our statesmen a little more solicitous about freedom of speech, freedom of assembly, freedom from compulsory military service, freedom from purchased power in the United States Senate, freedom from judicial tyranny through the exercise of the Supreme Court's veto and the misuse of the contempt process. In order to be fairly progressive or liberal it is not necessary to start undermining the pillars of the temple. Just a leaning toward democracy and a preservation of the people's liberties and self-government are, it seems to me, a reasonable standard by which to measure our political progressives. We would like to hear them (even if they wish to vote for a tariff on lemons) declare against imprisoning people for their political convictions whether in California or under hysteria-made war laws. We would like to hear a protest against decisions of the United States Supreme Court wiping out those amendments to the federal Constitution which are supposed to guarantee the people in the exercise of their citizenship.

We have no quarrel with Senator Johnson. We have always admired his fight on the Southern Pacific, but we can't go on exploiting last year's bird nests and be regarded as progressives.

An Appeal from Stefan Zweig

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I appeal to you on behalf of a German writer whose condition is extremely precarious and who has done as much as anyone else for America in a spiritual sense. I am appealing for Hans Reisiger, who besides having produced valuable works of his own has given to the Germans a splendid edition of Walt Whitman's works. It contains not only a masterly biography but also a translation in truly poetical German. Through him Walt Whitman has been made familiar to the Germans. American newspapers have enthusiastically reviewed this edition, which meant to such men as Gerhart Hauptmann and Thomas Mann an unforgettable experience. If any German writer deserves to be helped by America it is Hans Reisiger.

I happen to know that he is very badly off. His work on Walt Whitman is big and expensive and so has small sales. He is eager to introduce another prominent American writer, Thoreau, to the Germans. To achieve this, he needs a little rest from the commercial English translations he has to make, in order to gain some kind of a livelihood. Maybe there exists in America a Walt Whitman association that would help him out of gratitude for his eminent services. Hans Reisiger has been forced to give up his home and migrates from place to place. Any money intended for him may be sent to my address.

The Poles Protect "Their" Jews

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: It appears from the press of November 27 that the Polish ambassador filed an official protest with the German chancellor against the mistreatment and plundering which Jewish citizens of Poland suffered during recent disorders in Berlin. They demand, first, that the guilty be punished and, second, reparations for the damages sustained. My sympathy in this matter is entirely with the Poles because I really think it terrible on the part of the Germans of Berlin not to know that the Jewish citizens of Poland belong to the Poles and that the right to mistreat and plunder such Jews is strictly and purely a Polish right. Did not the Lord create German Jews for them?

I am thinking of a story told of a massacre in the days of the Czar, when two Cossacks played protectors to two Jews. Each defended his Jew loyally until one of them took a dislike to the Jew of the other and dealt him a blow in the face. This provoked the other Cossack to the extent that he treated the Jew of the first Cossack in the same manner. It was not until each Cossack killed the Jew of the other that they considered the argument satisfactorily settled.

I sincerely hope that in case the Berlin officials disregard the formal protest of the Poles, the latter will not try to settle the argument by avenging themselves on German or other Jews, but, on the contrary, treat the Jews in their own Poland in such a human way as to set a fine example to the cruel Germans of Berlin.

An Appeal for Clemency

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The case of a group of men now in prison in Texas should interest your readers. About eleven years ago a party of Mexicans, with one citizen of the United States, Charles Cline, started for Mexico to take part in an insurrection against Diaz. The Texas authorities tried to keep them from crossing the border. There was a running fight of several days, and in the course of it a Mexican gunman who had been made a deputy sheriff was killed. It is not known with certainty who killed him; but on account of it the entire party when captured were sentenced to life imprisonment for murder.

They have already served more than ten years. All appeals for clemency have thus far been in vain. It is believed that this severity is really not so much because they killed a Mexican as because among their baggage was found a banner with the motto Land and Liberty.

An earnest effort is being made to secure the pardon of these men, and especially of Cline. Friends of mine who knew him before his imprisonment describe him as a fine, clean, courageous young labor leader. Appeals for clemency have been made by various prominent persons and labor organizations in the United States, as well as by President Obregon and the Mexican Federation of Labor. Will not your readers, if they think these men have suffered enough, write to Governor Pat N. Neff, Austin, Texas, and join in the request for a pardon?

Recollaring the Clergy

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your issue of December 5 there appeared a communication from a correspondent referring to a purchase of collars made by the American Red Cross for shipment to Japan in connection with the relief work there. It occurred to me that you might be interested in knowing that these supplies were purchased upon direct requisition from the Japanese Imperial Emergency Relief Bureau confirmed by the Japanese Embassy here; and, from advices received, are intended for the use of the clerical classes rendered destitute in this disaster.

Arlie Gelston

Arlie Gelston. By Roger L. Sergel. B. W. Huebsch. $2.

"ARLIE GELSTON" would seem, at first glance, to fit quite neatly into one of several pigeonholes made to dispose of the modern novel, and doubtless will be so fitted—probably into the one labeled "another realistic novel of the Middle West." But actually, in spite of the emphasis upon Coon Falls, Iowa, and the painstaking relation of details, what power the book has is in other elements. The place does not matter, as it matters in "Clayhanger" and "The Return of the Native." The realism, carefully and slowly worked out, never has that last, essential keenness.

It might be—and will be—called "another story of the fallen woman." To this much-worked theme, which has fascinated men novelists particularly, since the day of "Pamela," one little ray of illumination has been added in "Arlie Gelston." It is found in the underlying thought of the book, not, as might be expected, in the fact that the old tale is retold in an Iowa setting under the conditions of today. "Arlie Gelston" speaks one thing not spoken in "Esther Waters" nor in any of the other novels of similar theme. Arlie—a provincial girl who "goes wrong" helplessly and blindly, marries when her baby is born, is widowed and marries again, just as helplessly, but returns to her husband instead of giving up for the third time to blind impulse—learns that to keep on submitting herself to the compulsion of sex would be to meet extinction of her self.

If "Arlie Gelston" fails to give the sharp poignancy of place for which one somehow feels that it labors, it does not have certain prevailing weaknesses of realistic fiction. Mr. Sergel never makes the common and easy mistake of being deceived by much-used words and phrases. He does not accept the girl's life as "drab" and "depressing" on the face of it because she is inarticulate and lives in poor surroundings. The book does not have the little neat, tinny quality that this would give, but rather a suggestion of depth and universality. He does not make the other mistake of sentimentalizing his heroine and adding a dramatic grandeur which is not there. There is strength in the underlying conception, in the organization and working out of the story. There is, because of this, a kind of nobility which is pleasing without overdrawing. This first novel is not faulty in conception or form. It is not hasty or shallow, nor does it ever get out of hand. Rather, one feels it almost too carefully, too slowly and deliberately done, never with that sharp stroke that brings the thing into relief.

The trouble with the whole tale is that it seems submerged under a kind of sea from which rise gleams that never quite break. There is a muffled atmosphere through which the characters fail to make their way. One can not point to this or that as wrong or out of character, but there is no strong feeling of the people as people. Action is better than conversation, which is carefully recorded but as if from afar, and without that keen sense of "rightness," those indefinable touches, which mark the novelist who has a feeling for character. Mr. Sergel has looked at these people conscientiously and without prejudice, but he just fails to reach them, so that the reader never gets to the point of wanting to exclaim, "Yes!" Perhaps, after all, whether he "knows" Coon Falls or not, he remains a little unsure, a little alien to it. Had Mr. Sergel had this intensity of understanding, he might easily have used four hundred and twenty pages for his story, but he would not have needed them. There is a lack of strong concentration in the book, so that each scene gives many fine things and is just on the brink of finer, but never the essence of anything.

There is, with all of this, a power and distinction which is not keenly felt, and yet is there. It lies in those elements which verge upon poetry. It is in certain beautiful sentences, in the indefinite power of atmosphere, in poetic perceptions, in the feeling that comes from the sky at evening, the snow, the scent of the river. Both Mr. Sergel's power and his weakness as a novelist come from the thing that his heroine once felt as she looked at the river:

"She was dizzy before the huge insubstantiality of the earth. She wanted it to become the land it was, a county, Iowa."

It never really does this; nor is the other feeling of "huge insubstantiality" great enough to give a compensating value. The worth of the book lies, finally, in sentences—in gleams that come from that shrouding and muffling sea:

"But when the strong moon broke the clouds at last and the fields knew for an hour the quiet flood, she was lifted into a sourceless cold brilliance. With the hour, with morning, it would disintegrate into separate and innumerable molds. Provincial by its own necessity it would shape itself into grotesque form and place. But Arlie, sleeping in release from Des Moines and the Isis, was aware only of her wide and vacant dream."

The book leaves one with a desire to press it all together, hard, and see if some final essence cannot escape.

A Teacher's Diary

My Class in Composition. By Julien Bezard. Translated and adapted by Phyllis Robbins. Harvard University Press. $2.50.

A FEW years ago Rollo Walter Brown put American teachers in his debt by his careful and thorough account of French methods of teaching composition ("How the French Boy Learns to Write"). M. Bezard's book is a sort of sequel and illustration of Mr. Brown's. It takes us into the classroom of an enthusiastic and skilful teacher and shows what he expects of his boys, how he cooperates with them, and something of what they accomplish. The subtitle, "A Teacher's Diary," is perhaps a little misleading; the volume is rather a series of extracts from a teacher's day-book, or record of assignments, suggestions, and criticisms, with many specimen themes.

The class (in the Lycée Hoche, at Versailles) is made up of sixteen- and seventeen-year-old boys. The course consists of a series of theme assignments, beginning with subjects based on observation, such as anecdotes of town and village life, or memories of school, and proceeding through longer and more carefully planned papers on topics familiar to boys, such as stamp-collecting and the making of an herbarium, to subjects drawn from the history and literature which the pupils are studying in other courses. No attention is paid to the arbitrary distinctions of the "forms of discourse." A great deal of time is given to the preliminary discussion of theme assignments; M. Bezard believes, with most French teachers, that such preparatory work is more important than the correction of themes. The teacher works out with the class an outline (by paragraphs or main divisions) for almost every paper; this general outline every pupil is expected to follow, developing details in the best way he can. The most successful themes are then read and criticized in the classroom; and the teacher, with the advice and cooperation of the class, draws from them a sort of composite theme, using the best parts of two or more papers, and sometimes, if no student has treated one section of the subject adequately, supplying the deficiency with a piece of his own writing. Many of the themes quoted in the book are thus "revised and amplified" by the teacher, who, says M. Bezard, "after doing full justice to the good points in his pupils' themes, should not fear to complete them in his own, to develop them, to raise them as it were to the second power."

There are obvious objections to some features of this method. To require of a class themes so uniformly planned that parts shall be interchangeable involves a serious sacrifice of individual initiative and spontaneity, even when the plan is the result of the collaboration of the class with the teacher. In America, I am pretty certain, the best students would not do their best work within such limits; French pupils are probably more docile. Even the requirement that all themes on a given day must deal with the same topic has disadvantages as well as advantages. It sacrifices the interest which comes from variety of subjects and altogether misses the best sources of material, which are the special knowledge and experiences of individual students; on the other hand, it gives unity and point to class discussions. It should be, I think, an occasional rather than a general practice.

In spite of such objections, however, M. Bezard's method can give us invaluable help. Our composition teaching suffers from a worse than Egyptian plague of rules and textbooks. We have carried into the realm of writing our naive faith in laws as a method of reform, and delude ourselves into thinking that we can get rid of sins of expression by teaching and learning rules. Handbooks of rules, scrap-books of specimens, textbooks of rhetorical theory, books upon the sentence, upon the paragraph, upon punctuation, upon the "forms of discourse" swarm among us, and we often inflict two or three of these plagues upon the student at the same time. We put a high premium upon correctness, yet the writing of our students is notoriously incorrect. Probably the greatest service that M. Bezard can do us is to suggest that we have absurdly overstressed rhetorical theory and details of form at the expense of substance. If he uses a textbook of any sort, his diary says not a word of it. His attitude toward errors of detail may be indicated by a quotation: "Of course, shortcomings must be criticized, mistakes pointed out, weeds pulled up whenever they sprout too abundantly in favorable soil. But how much surer it is, relying on the preventive method so dear to modern medicine, to strengthen the organism so that it will itself eliminate the harmful seeds." HOMER E. WOODBRIDGE

Thirty Years of the East Side

Haunch Paunch and Jowl. An Anonymous Autobiography. Boni and Liveright. $3.

NOBODY can, or will, write the book about himself and sign it. Not so much because of certain actions and thoughts one does not care to unveil, as because of the other people such confessions might involve. For though we have the right to tell the truth about ourselves we have no right to tell the truth about others. An anonymous autobiography in which "the others" are just as anonymous is, to my mind, the best way out of the difficulty.

"Haunch Paunch and Jowl" is the autobiography of one who has come up in the world from petty sneakthiefery and gangsterdom to the justiceship of an important court. It describes also the lives of a celebrated lawyer, a successful theater manager, several judges, a wealthy manufacturer, the founder or founders of the needle industry union, a few settlement workers, and a number of well-known politicians and philanthropists.

It is the East Side, New York's East Side, again: its idealism, its inner dissensions, the hatred between the German and the Russian Jews (against the description of which in my article in The Nation the Jewish press has protested so violently), the corruption of its politics, the pitilessness of the shyster lawyers in their dealings with poor ignorant immigrants in trouble.

The immigrants, lured here by rosy tales of wealth and liberty, with dreams of education for their children, find out too late what they have to pay for their dreams. The finer the grain the less the resistance. But the coarse one lives through, adapts himself, rises, moves away from the East Side to Harlem and from Harlem to Riverside. The children—the children of the newly arrived immigrant—become acquainted and soiled with every form of degradation and corruption. Reading the book was like listening to a recital of the well-known stories of the East Side. I know the judge in question, in fact, the judges: the one who made a reputation for his strictness and the other for his chumminess with the gangsters, the gorillas. Who does not know Maxi, the sharp, soft-spoken criminal lawyer who himself writes the decisions of the judges, and that unforgettable East Side congressman whose every speech was a denunciation of the Russian Czar's regime? And there is only one "Talker's" coffee house on Division Street. The scene of vandalism when the Jewish gangsters, murderers, and thieves, pious on Yom Kippur, the day of atonement, maimed the members of the group "Truth and Light" who dared to eat on fasting day—that great day has not been forgotten. Religion triumphed. "Haunch Paunch and Jowl" is not an autobiography. It is thirty years of history. The birth of theater managership, of jazz, the unfolding of Al Wolf from a fedora-hatted peanut vendor into a powerful theater magnate, and the development of a singing pickpocket into a king of popular song. Some of the gangsters rose to prominence; others went to the electric chair. It is a marvelously wrought book with deep, stirring moments. Through it runs a pure and tragic love, the perfume of a rose in a charnel house.

Phillip, Uncle Phillip, is the pivot around which turns the description of the industrial situation of those days: pitiless exploitation, unscrupulous competition, strikes, the employment of gangsters to break the strike, the counter-gansters, the scheming sweatshop owners, the dirt and the corruption of it all.

It has changed a good deal in the last few years, but it is still largely the same. Reform only changes the personnel and not the system. The East Side is like Jerusalem revived. With Christs and Isaiahs and Sadducees and Pharisees. All the beauty, purity, idealism, and all the corruption of the Orient reenacted in a different setting, because and in spite of the setting. A vortex within a vortex, a struggle to death. The carrousel, crowded with laughing Polichinelles, turns, and the throaty steam organ grinds out a solemn tune, and jazz is being played in a lofty cathedral. KONRAD BERCOVICI

Credit and Crises

Monetary Reconstruction. By R. G. Hawtrey. Longmans, Green and Company. $3.

The Paper Moneys of Europe. By Francis W. Hirst. Houghton Mifflin Company. 75 cents.

Cycles of Unemployment. By William A. Berridge. Houghton Mifflin Company. $1.25.

Costs and Profits. By Hudson Bridge Hastings. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.50.

THE war has hammered into men's heads one useful idea—that the primary quality of a good money is stability of value. It has demonstrated likewise that the control of bank credit is essential if we are to stabilize prices. Mr. R. G. Hawtrey has done yeoman service in this field. He entertains no illusions about the gold standard, but like all intelligent theorists recognizes that "artificial" control is necessary if prices are to be stable. His notable discussion of our Federal Reserve system, in the chapter given to that subject, points out clearly the wide measure of control over prices that the Federal Reserve Board can and ought to exercise through its power to fix the rate of rediscount. Mr. Hawtrey performs a service in his strong insistence on the power of the central bank to control inflation through a judicious use of the discount rate. We ought to give that responsibility definitely to the Federal Reserve Board, and hold it to its duty.

In his chapter on the European currency situation, Mr. Hawtrey recognizes that drastic deflation would only pile fresh ills on top of those already caused by inflation. He suggests a revaluation of money units, with international cooperation to maintain their stability by means of a gold exchange standard—an interesting theoretical possibility, apparently some distance away, in view of present happenings. But nothing can be done, of course, without balanced budgets.

Francis W. Hirst's little tract on "The Paper Moneys of Europe," a lecture delivered at the University of California on the Barbara Weinstock Foundation, tells again the familiar story of the assignats of the French Revolution, and points out how much worse the present situation is than the one then existing. It is a serviceable reminder of well-known truths, using some present European conditions for illustration.

If price levels fluctuate, then business activity will fluctuate, too. William A. Berridge's "Cycles of Unemployment" is a very careful technical statistical study of the available evidence concerning employment fluctuations in the United States since 1903. Employment indexes follow the other indexes of business activity at about a six months' interval, and probably themselves forecast by a few months the commercial buying power of wage earners. Mr. Berridge's work should help not only the technical economist, but also the practical business man and the statesman who are trying to soften the incidence of business depression on the wage worker. But why cannot the Pollak Foundation and their publishers either put their footnotes at the bottom of the pages, where they belong, or else leave them out altogether? Their present arrangement is perfectly calculated to cause the maximum of trouble for the student.

Hudson Bridges Hastings's "Costs and Profits," another Pollak Foundation book, is a highly abstract analysis of the causation of the cycle, based on the changing relation of costs and profits. It is frightfully hard reading, but Mr. Hastings kindly summarizes his conclusions in the first part of his book. He finds the underlying causes of commercial crises to be five, all based essentially on current business policies with reference to the relations between money and goods, as follows: (1) The failure of business concerns as a whole to disburse an amount of money equal to the value of the things they produce; (2) the development of forward buying and speculation, leading to a relative overdevelopment of industries producing commodities as compared with those producing services; (3) the accumulation of stocks held on speculation; (4) the use of savings and profits to produce goods not used in the processes of production and distribution; (5) the lag in the flow of interest and profits into the hands of ultimate buyers on account of intercorporate ownership of securities. The orthodox theorist has thus come to assert specifically, not only the possibility, but the practical inevitability of temporary general overproduction in the sense of a deficiency of purchasing power in the hands of those who want to buy goods. The vigorous study now being given to the relation between the flow of purchasing power and the actual output of goods and services is full of promise for the ultimate control of the cycle.

A New Marco Polo

Wandering in Northern China. By Harry A. Franck. The Century Company. $5.

IN "Wandering in Northern China" Mr. Franck offers fresh delight to the growing number of vicarious travelers whom prudent regard for the American idol detains by their own firesides and office-desks, while an inborn longing sends their spirits in pursuit of adventure.

China has been a fascinating country to the traveler since Marco Polo brought thence tales of surpassing wealth and splendor. Her charm did not wane, though official visits were fewer, during many centuries when foreign visitors were admitted to her court only as representatives of vassal states owing tribute to the emperors upon the Dragon Throne. Interest was renewed when Western nations forced open doors for exploiting the immense natural resources of the empire and for preaching Christianity and marketing opium, tobacco, oil, and other blessings of civilization among its ignorant millions. And as its port cities became rapidly Europeanized and increasing numbers of Chinese students sought education abroad and excited hopes of its westernization, and especially after the government was suddenly democratized, a tide of travel turned toward China in the wake of commercial and benevolent enterprise. A modern traveler in quest of adventure must therefore leave the treaty ports with their complexities and comforts and seek in the interior the monuments and ruins, the glamor and filth of the oldest surviving civilization. Mr. Franck avoids also entangling alliances with commercial, political, and religious interests. He is merely a traveler who enjoys traveling and who wants to see for himself and to report what he sees with candor and fairness. Consequently, his account has much to offer the student as well as the fireside tourist.

Approaching China through Korea, he observes the efforts of the Japanese to introduce much-needed improvements and reforms in that picturesque and unhappy land. And he cannot help seeing that their brutality and blundering indifference to injustice hinder their efforts as reformers and damage their reputation as empire-builders. Across the border in Manchuria Japanese influence gives way to the strong military power of the war lord of the north, whose orderly rule at Mukden raises some hope of permanence and real progress. In northern Manchuria, and especially in Harbin, hordes of Russian refugees, hungry, proud, dissolute, and irresponsible, incapable of profiting by their most bitter experiences, tend to weaken, Mr. Franck feels, the doctrine of the supremacy of the white race. Struck by the character of these refugees the wanderer remarks: "a few days in northern Manchuria were enough to explain why the Jews are so powerful and so hated in Russia . . . almost enough to make clear the incredible success of bolshevism over common sense." Very few travelers have cared to risk the dangers of crossing the Gobi Desert to Urga, the holy city of Mongolia. There the filth and stupidity of the fierce Mongol nomads and the bestial superstition of Lamaism imported from Tibet are not mitigated by the actual but unrecognized rule of Russian "Reds" and natural good nature and tolerance have been replaced by suspicion and intrigue.

Wandering in the middle provinces, with a comfortable home in Peking as a center, brings Mr. Franck in contact with life and problems more essentially Chinese. Peking he finds a city of extraordinary contrasts—where, under an almost anarchistic republican regime, a woman is absolutely safe in any part of the city at any time of day or night, where a deposed emperor is supported by the republic that deposed him, and where camel trains and limousines, smart foreign officers and pig-tailed coolies jostle one another daily in Hata Men Street. To the south he visits Shantung, the province of Confucius, where the Chinese now have a chance to manage or ruin the railroads and well-planned city they have at last received from the Japanese. Further south, in the province of Honan is Kaifeng, which Feng Yü-hsiang, the Christian general, cleaned up during his six months' rule, and where a colony of Jews has been completely assimilated. In this province the Chinese unemployment problem breaks out in banditry under the very nose of Wu Pei-fu and the bandits by skilful use of foreign hostages and the pressure of foreign governments succeed in enforcing most of their demands upon the central Government. In Shansi, the "model province," he sees what a Chinese tuchun can do in improving schools, soldiers, and roads, eradicating banditry and opium and foot-binding, and making his province safer and more modern if less picturesque.

In the west he meets poverty and suffering combined with good nature and industry inconceivable to the stay-at-home. Here opium is still grown for the profit it brings, and wheat famine is frequent. Here foot-binding is so universal that the traveler himself exclaimed at the "ugliness" of a woman with natural feet. Here poverty, overpopulation, unemployment, and centuries of destruction not only of trees but even of their roots, with consequent failure of rainfall and the wearing away of the soil itself, have produced such depths of human misery that patience has become a curse. Yet this universal good nature of the Chinese, together with their habitual industry, redeems the gloom of every traveler's tale of China and offers some hope of an ultimate solution of her problems.

It is regrettable that the author could not fulfil the hope held out in his foreword of representing Chinese words by phonetic symbols less mystifying than the usual romanization. But wholesale reform is doubtless impracticable. It is more regrettable that he did not by adding an index make "Wandering in Northern China" a valuable reference book as well as an informing and amusing companion of the fireside traveler. Its five hundred pages full of useful information do not deserve the neglect into which such an oversight will inevitably throw them.

The War and the Consequences Thereof

The Genesis of the War. By Herbert Henry Asquith. George H. Doran Company. $6.

Where Are We Going? By David Lloyd George. George H. Doran Company. $3.

IF books were priced according to their power of absorbing the reader's attention, it is Mr. Lloyd George's book that would cost the bigger sum and Mr. Asquith's the smaller. Mr. Asquith's might effectively be prescribed as a remedy for insomnia, while Mr. Lloyd George's would be better than a wet towel around the forehead at the end of a tiring day. The senior of the two ex-Premiers is anything but a dull speaker. But there is much in this volume that no one can struggle through who is not responsive to an overmastering sense of duty. Mr. Lloyd George, on the other hand, contrives to retain on the printed page the outstanding characteristics of his platform oratory. He is as vivid and stimulating as ever, especially by means of his amazing skill in summing up a situation in a graphic metaphor. What a descriptive reporter was lost to the press when he went into Parliament! The chapter in which he records successively his memories of the scene when Gladstone introduced his final Home Rule Bill and of the signing of the Irish Treaty at Downing Street is a masterpiece of realistic writing.

In the first sentence of his preface Mr. Asquith deprecates by implication any comparison with the other author-member of his family. "This book," he remarks, "is not an autobiography." Nor does it review either the war or the consequences thereof, but limits its scope to tracing the genesis of the war through all the antecedent stages up to the final outbreak. It is significant that references to the Kaiser take up the lion's share of the index. Somehow he seems to have got on Mr. Asquith's nerves, so much so that he is sometimes dragged in quite irrelevantly, as, e.g., in a discussion of his claims to scholarship. "A Polemic Against the Kaiser" would, indeed, have served fairly well as a subtitle for the book.

There is very little of the "Now It Can Be Told" about Mr. Asquith's story. It is mainly from material already accessible that he constructs his narrative of the formation of the Entente and of the efforts made by Lord Haldane's mission to Berlin and otherwise to maintain friendly relations between England and Germany. One notes that Mr. Asquith declares himself "as satisfied as one can be of anything in the domain of conjecture" that, if Baron Marschall had not died a few months after his appointment to the London Embassy, there would have been no European War in 1914. Opinions will differ as to whether his apologia for the foreign policy of Great Britain is adequate; whether, for instance, he satisfactorily disposes of the suspicion that her Government had tied its hands by the military and naval "conversations" with France. Moreover, he ignores the later revelations about the mobilization of Russia and its effect in precipitating the debacle. No unbiased person, however, can deny that he defends himself convincingly against the charge that the Government of which he was the head was inefficient or careless in its preparations against a possible war. Typical of the thoroughness with which everything was arranged in advance was the compilation of the War Book, which incorporated all the plans that had been determined upon to meet that contingency. We are told that draft Orders in Council accompanied the King wherever he went in time of profound peace and were kept set up in type in the printer's office as well, so that on a sudden outbreak of war they could be circulated and put into operation at a moment's notice. Mr. Asquith is justly contemptuous of the popular scares that were fomented by people who should have known better. He speaks of the German invasion of England as "a chimerical danger with which the great authority of Lord Roberts alarmed the public imagination, and which, in deference to him, received careful and protracted investigation in 1907-8 by the Committee of Imperial Defense under my chairmanship."

If Mr. Asquith's book tells us of the Genesis of the War, Mr. Lloyd George's begins with the Exodus from it. The chapters herein collected "represent a running comment on the European situation during the past ten months." No hint is given of the circumstances in which these "periodic reviews" were made. We are left guessing whether they were originally entries in the author's diary, or letters to friends in the Antipodes, or—incredible hypothesis!—contributions to the yellow press. The most obvious criticism of the book is suggested by its opening sentence, in which Mr. Lloyd George invites us to imagine the impression that present-day Europe would make on a man who had been wrecked on a desert island on a bright July morning in 1914 and had returned to civilization a week ago. Let us carry the speculation a little further and suppose this lucky fellow attempting to reconstruct, from a study of this volume, a record of its author's own activities and policies during the intervening period. After reading the chapter on The Treaty of Lausanne, with its picture of Britain, France, Italy, and the United States as helpless tarpon, lying on the bank with the Turkish hook in their gullets and without a swish left in their tails, how could our Robinson Crusoe suspect for a moment that David Lloyd George had himself contributed in the least degree to such an unhappy result? From the book as a whole he would naturally conclude that in the peace negotiations the British Premier of that day would have risked his political career, if that had been necessary, in order to prevent any settlement that had in it the faintest trace of greed or vengeance. "Enduring peace," we are solemnly assured, "can only rest on a foundation of justice." In the discussion of the tendencies that lead to war there are many pages of a criticism so scathing that we begin to wonder whether it is Lloyd George or Lowes Dickinson that we are reading, and they are accompanied by moral appeals so fervent that they might fittingly have come from an Archbishop of Canterbury.

Books in Brief

The Letters of Alciphron. Translated by F. A. Wright. E. P. Dutton and Company. $3.

Another volume in the rapidly expanding series of Broadway Translations, which are designed to present some of the "more robust and human examples" of classical and medieval literature. Alciphron is delightfully modern, and the translator has contrived—with one or two discreet lapses into Latin—to give the flavor and color of the original.

Undertow. By Henry K. Marks. Harper and Brothers. $2.

As the case history of a family of remarkable dulness and uninteresting degeneracy, this book possibly justifies itself. Its claim to consideration as literature can scarcely be allowed, although the sordidness is slapped on with such generosity that it cannot avoid an occasional touch of effectiveness. The author gives life a coat of tar and feathers, and thinks that he has clothed it in reality.

The Art of Poetry. Seven Lectures, 1920-1922. By William Paton Ker. Oxford University Press. $2.

The professor of poetry at Oxford was a profound and witty scholar who is perhaps too little read in America. He knew more than Matthew Arnold did, was fairer, had more common sense, and loved poetry as well. All that he lacks is the narrow passion which made that other professor of poetry penetrate so far. In these vastly entertaining lectures on Shelley, Milton, Pope, Molière, Arnold, Romantic Fallacies, and The Art of Poetry he moves easily through a wide world of literature, stirring the memory to old enthusiasms which he deepens or corrects by the light of his accumulated wisdom.

The Viking Heart. By Laura Goodman Salverson. George H. Doran Company. $2.

Earnestness, in lieu of the less cumbrous endowments of a truly gifted story teller, may be made to serve an honorable purpose in the writing of fiction, and has done so in this case. A solid and straightforward recital of life among Icelandic emigrants in Canada.

Second Contemporary Verse Anthology. Selected from the magazine Contemporary Verse, 1920-1923, by Charles Wharton Stork. E. P. Dutton and Company. $3.

Most of this is hundred per cent American verse—optimistic, mild, and mediocre.

From an American Legation. By Ira Nelson Morris. Alfred A. Knopf. $4.

As a literary production, this book by the American minister to Sweden from 1914 to 1923 is even more neutral than Sweden tried to be. As a contribution to the now-it-can-be-told archives, it is a lamblike document with but few burrs of disillusion in its optimistic wool. Mr. Morris "seems to see a light ahead"; he affirms that "the only way to stop war is to remove its causes," and—without himself contributing anything very tangible toward the solution—manages to emerge with the hopeful, unembarrassed smile of a Sunday-school superintendent on a bright Sabbath morning.

The Philosophy of Civilization. By R. H. Towner. G. P. Putnam's Sons. Two volumes. $5.

The cornerstone of this curious work built up with baffling ingenuity, is that civilization rises and falls in accordance with mathematical law. There are many astounding corollaries. "Civilization has been contemporaneous with alcoholic temptation; savagery with prohibition." "Popular or democratic governments . . . are invariably anti-Christian." "A nation that obeys the gospel of Jesus will find mathematical law always in its favor." Mr. Towner's entire conception is too intricate for normal assimilation; it impresses one vaguely as a triumph of mathematics over mind.

Barnabé and His Whale. By René Thévenin. Translated by Ben Ray Redman. Robert M. McBride and Company. $2.

Doubtless there is a public for such a translation as this, otherwise it would not be made. It strikes one, however, as rather feeble fantasy, deficient in ingenuity and halting in action. "So it appears"—to quote from page 155—"as Médor (called Poil Maudit) had discovered, and as Barnabé Tignol was to discover also some two months later, that the Vicomte Melchior de Frétilly and the student Jean Gautier were simply one and the same person. But why this double mystery? Zoë Croche, keenly intrigued by this mystery, could not postpone fathoming it. As for the reader, he has, no doubt, already guessed." Well, as for the reader, he has, no doubt, by this time, ceased to be "intrigued."

The Cults of Campania. By Roy Merle Peterson. American Academy in Rome. $2.50.

In this volume of 400 pages Mr. Peterson treats exhaustively the ancient religions which have left records of themselves in the area between the Volturnus on the north and the peninsula of Surrentum on the south, a district by reason of easy sea communication particularly susceptible to outside influence, and by reason of land routes very effective in the transmission of this influence to Rome. Its religious life included cults from Persia, Chaldea, Syria, Palestine, Egypt, Greece, and Africa, the native Italian cults, and Christianity itself. The cosmopolitan character of Campanian religion and culture, together with the presence of the important cities of Cumae, Baiae, Pompeii, Caqua, and Puteoli, lend to Mr. Peterson's work, despite its being primarily concerned with detail, a very considerable interest for the general reader as throwing light on the universal aspect of Italian and Roman civilization. The American Academy is to be congratulated on the success and the significance of this initial volume of its Papers and Monographs, and the American republic of letters on its able representation in Rome.

Brighter Intervals. By Gordon Phillips. London: Nisbet and Company, Ltd., 5 shillings.

With a deprecatory gesture, the author suggests that the contents of his book be taken lying down, since most books—"except French novels (which necessitate getting up and looking for the dictionary) and handbooks on golf"—are most easily assimilated in that posture. Mr. Phillips twangs a very light lyre; neither in his prose nor in his verse does he serenade a comic muse on a balcony much higher than his own head.

The Nation's Poetry Prize

THE NATION offers an annual poetry prize of $100 for the best poem submitted by an American poet in a contest conducted by The Nation each year between Thanksgiving and New Year's Day. The rules for the contest in 1923 are as follows:

1. Each manuscript submitted in the contest must reach the office of The Nation, 20 Vesey Street, New York City, not earlier than Saturday, December 1, and not later than Monday, December 31, plainly marked on the outside of the envelope, "For The Nation's Poetry Prize."
2. Manuscripts must be typewritten and must have the name of the author in full on each page of the manuscript submitted.
3. As no manuscripts submitted in this contest will in any circumstances be returned to the author it is unnecessary to inclose return postage. An acknowledgment of the receipt of each manuscript, however, will be sent from this office.
4. No more than three poems from the same author will be admitted to the contest.
5. No restriction is placed upon the subject or form of poems submitted, which may be in any meter or in free verse. It will be impossible, however, to consider poems which are more than 400 lines in length, or which are translations, or which are in any language other than English. Poems arranged in a definite sequence may, if the author so desires, be counted as a single poem.
6. The winning poem will be published in the Midwinter Literary Supplement of The Nation, to appear February 13, 1924.
7. Besides the winning poem, The Nation reserves the right to purchase at its usual rates any other poem submitted in the contest.

Legend

THE platitudinous "Bluebird" and the facile mysticism of the later essays have almost made us forget that when Maurice Maeterlinck was a young man he wrote a series of beautiful dramatic legends that told in figures and symbols the story, which is as old as the world, of the fear that haunts men, fear of their fate in a homeless universe, fear that whatever is lovely and rare and therefore fragile will go down to disaster, fear, above all, of the inevitable end. Some of these legends, "Intérieur" and "Les Aveugles," Maeterlinck invented. And these invented dramatic legends are, strangely enough, the best. Others he borrowed from literature and tradition and clothed them in that atmosphere of awe-struck beauty which is his specific contribution to literature. It was absurd of Octave Mirbeau to call the young Fleming the "Belgian Shakespeare"; the admiration which Maeterlinck's early plays evoked was not absurd. To recall them today seems to me peculiarly useful because we have many new plays that are symbolical and obscure. Maeterlinck is never that. The early plays are never flatly didactic like the "Bluebird"; they are crystalline in spite of their somberness of mood. The mind may not always be able to formulate their meaning which never fails, however, to find the soul.

"Pelléas and Mélisande" is, of course, a retelling of the story of Paolo and Francesca. But it withdraws that story from both the tumult and the accidents of time and place and definite law and custom and makes it the story of the pitifulness of hearts that must be free and that are doomed. All the hearts here are pitiful, even the angry and deluded heart of Golaud. The lovers of the story have no hope from the first and must give their all for that one immortal moment of the cry of Pelléas: "All's lost, all's saved." And the conclusion of the story, which is in truth the conclusion of all mortal stories, is in the words of the wise old king: "If I were God how I would pity the hearts of men."

It is late in the day to remark upon the style of the dramatic dialogue in these plays of Maeterlinck. But it seems not yet to be understood. Its method is the method of understatement which we find in popular legends and folksongs, the method of laconic speech with tragic implications rather than that of passionate outburst and relief. The constant use of this method will often degenerate into mannerism. But it has moments of beautiful effectiveness, of ample power, like that moment in which the cry of Mélisande, "I am not happy!" strikes deeper than many tirades in verse and prose.

The production at the Times Square Theater has its inequalities both in respect of scenic investiture and the interpretation of the text. The playing of the first scene of the first act is incredibly out of key. Here Maeterlinck's tragic hints are twisted into loud realistic chatter. It is fair to say that Mr. Reicher recovered the characteristic music of the piece almost at once and did not fail either to hear or to express it again. Mr. Rollo Peter's designs are unequal, too. But the best of them give a very poignant sense of those desperate though magic casements on the marge of a sunless sea, and many of his scenic moments are superbly "composed" and one remembers figures that stood still on the stage for only a second but remain fixed in the mind.

Miss Cowl is to be most highly commended for her selection of the play. No actress of today has had a braver or more artistic inspiration than this of following "Romeo and Juliet" with "Pelléas and Mélisande." Soon we shall altogether forget that there ever were such pieces as "Lilac Time" and "Smilin' Through." And the possibility of our being able to forget those plays augurs well for the future of our stage. Miss Cowl's performance, like the production, has one or two moments in which the key of the play's inner music—and that is everything here—is lost. Especially her cry at the moment of the murder of Pelléas, her cry of grief and terror, is far too realistic and rends the atmosphere. But throughout the greater part of the evening she has the mild grace and awe and tenderness and passion always on the edge of doom which the playing requires, and she and her associates melt effortlessly into this timeless legend of what is of all time.

Who's Who in Mexico?

WHAT forces support President Obregon in the present revolutionary disturbances in Mexico? Charges have been made that only the extreme radical forces, the "Bolsheviks" of Mexico, are behind the present Government and that the moderate labor leaders and organizations as well as the upper and middle classes are behind his opponents. The documents presented below show where Mexican labor officially stands, and indicate certain of the lines dividing the forces now in opposition. The statement from General Calles printed at the end gives an idea of the position taken by the members of Obregon's Government. These documents have not been published elsewhere in English.

A Message to Gompers

A STATEMENT by the Mexican Federation of Labor, containing the text of a telegram sent to Samuel Gompers, was published on December 9.

In order that the false reports which are being sent to the United States may not be wrongly interpreted by American labor, the leaders of the Regional Federation have hastened to send a report to the president of the American Federation of Labor, asking at the same time the help of his supporters in combating the reactionaries residing in American territory. The telegram reads as follows:

MEXICO, December 8. Mr. Samuel Gompers, Washington, D. C.: Undoubtedly you have knowledge that some military elements, led by Guadelupe Sanchez, are revolting against the Government and that the head of the rebellion is the prevaricator Adolfo de la Huerta. This armed movement is attempting again to establish reaction and to revive the practice of enslaving the common people that once prevailed here. We have the honor to communicate to you that the Regional Mexican Federation of Labor absolutely supports the Government of President Obregon, and that we are getting ready to organize armed groups of workers to fight the revolution on the field whither the struggle has been carried and on which the labor movement does not refuse to accept the fight again. We are asking in the name of labor solidarity the support of the Pan-American Federation to avoid especially the development of enemy movements in that country.

Fraternally,
Gen. Sec'y, RICARDO TREVINO,
Sec'y of the Interior, R. CERVANTES TORRES.

Labor's Stand

THE Central Committee of the Mexican Federation of Labor issued on December 7 a general manifesto pledging the support of the organized workers of Mexico to the Government of President Obregon. A brief summary of the statement follows:

For some time the workers of the state of Vera Cruz and especially the workers of the country regions have been the victims of innumerable assaults on the part of the military by order of General Guadelupe Sanchez. Therefore this federation will oppose with pleasure the rebellion of Sanchez and all those who may follow him because it means the defense of the revolution in general and of the labor movement in particular. We beg to communicate to you the fact that we are sending instructions to the various sections of the confederation so that members may hasten to organize armed groups to combat the forces of the reaction which aim to reestablish the regime of inequality and slavery.

From the Artists and Writers

NOT only the manual workers but the organized artists and intellectuals have offered their support to the Obregon Government. On December 7 they sent to the President of the Republic the following telegram:

The League of Revolutionary Writers and the syndicate of technical workers, painters, and sculptors condemn the attitude of General Sanchez and Estrada and hasten to offer to the Government all moral and material assistance at our command.

Affectionately,
C. GUTIERREZ CRUZ, Gen. Sec'y.
D. ALFARO SILGUEIRROS, Gen. Sec. de Syndicate.

This League published a manifesto stating that the landowners of the so-called leagues of employers had used Mr. De la Huerta as a dummy and had taken up arms to fight the interests of the common people. This manifesto concludes as follows:

The common people must understand thoroughly their situation, and must not be taken by surprise by politicians who call themselves their friends and yet have joined the reactionary cause. This is happening in certain elements of the General Confederation of Labor who have been induced by the money of the middle class to oppose the agriculturists in order to divide the common people and put it under the yoke of landowners and exploitation. Comrades: the situation is clear cut: On the one side you will find wealthy landowners, on the other the farm worker and the laborer. Unite to defend the revolutionary principles, if necessary taking up arms in support of the present Government, while it defends the constitutional provisions which favor the laborers. In this manner we may respond to the call of the executive to laboring classes as direct participants in the social policy dictated by the present administration.

The League of Revolutionary Writers places itself on the side of the common people and the revolutionary principles, and it proposes to undertake a strong newspaper and oral campaign to fortify the conscience of its class—which the farm worker and the laborer so greatly need at this decisive moment for their economic, political, and social life. . . .

Mexican Labor's Pledge

THE Labor Party which represents in the political field the organized workers of Mexico sent the following message to President Obregon on December 6:

In the name of the Mexican Labor Party, formed by laborers and peasants, I hasten to express to you our firm purpose to collaborate with you in the new situation which has been created by the disloyal members of the army who have placed themselves at the disposal of De la Huerta and are supporting . . . the institutions of the reaction which proposes to take away the conquests which the working people of Mexico have won after long years of hard and bloody struggle. Today, as yesterday, our group is ready to occupy the place which, in its program of action, the Government may give to it. This committee which I have the honor to represent is addressing itself to the laboring class of the republic, showing the necessity of organizing properly and efficiently in order to declare a war to the finish on those who have declared themselves enemies to liberty and the progress to which the common people aspire. . . .

For the Committee,
Mexico City LUIS N. MORONES

Obregon's Message

THE following is a reply from President Obregon to a telegram sent to him by the Department of War announcing the rebellion of General Sanchez:

General Francisco R. Serrano, Secretary of War and Navy, Mexico: I have just read your message advising me as to the happenings in Vera Cruz. Notwithstanding the poor condition of my health am leaving tomorrow for the capital to dictate from there all the necessary measures to suppress the uprising that some military men, due to their ignorance of the significance of military honor, have started against the powers of the union and our institutions.

For some time General Guadelupe Sanchez, due to the influence which the reaction had made upon him, has shown his resistance to the development and fulfilment of the social program which has been the purpose of this Government. Never before have the people of the republic enjoyed greater liberty and never has the working class of the country experienced such benefits as the program of the revolution has made a fact. . . .

Please communicate to all the chiefs of operations the defection of General Sanchez, making it known that the executive will find support in the great majority of the army, which, to our pride, is giving loyalty and obedience to our institutions. . . . If necessary the executive will call upon the rural and other laboring classes of the country to collaborate with the Government in imposing peace and punishing the treason of the disloyal soldiers.

ALVARO OBREGON,
President of the Republic

Celaya, December [illegible]

General Calles on Mexico's Traitors

THE manifesto in which General Calles relinquished his candidacy in the presidential campaign and offered his services to Obregon against the rebels is published below:

When I accepted the candidacy for President of the Republic which was offered me by political groups I announced definitely that my fundamental purpose, if I succeeded, was to continue the work initiated by General Obregon of carrying into practice the social reforms which comprise the aspirations of the Mexican people. General Obregon has been, as a matter of fact, the first executive who has known how to direct his political work toward the ideal of social improvement which the Mexican revolution has followed since 1910. His Government has been the first to realize, as rapidly as constitutional provisions have allowed, an efficient redistribution of lands and at the same time it has been the first to offer facilities for the development of labor organizations enabling the industrial worker to reap the benefits of the social program contained in the constitution of 1917.

It was natural that the reaction should try to prevent the consolidation of a regime so firmly established on a program of social reform and, impotent to stop this movement by a victory at the polls of a reactionary candidacy, it attempted to gain through tumultuous uprising what it could not win on the legal ground of civil activities. Finding that their efforts to stir antagonism to President Obregon and his revolutionary policies through the press were fruitless, and having lost their parliamentary majority, the last hope of the De la Huerta group . . . they turned to the discredited method of the coup d'etat, seeking uselessly to direct this against a government identified with the interests of the masses. The neo-reactionaries, headed by Enrique Estrada and Guadelupe Sanchez (the two sworn enemies of agrarian reform and the accomplices of the landowners of Jalisco and Vera Cruz), forget that the majority of those who make up the federal army preserve their revolutionary idealism and that for the first time in our history the revolutionary army finds itself by reason of its origin bound to the common people of the country and the city and likewise to the middle class which has responded to the cause of the workers. The reaction foolishly thought that the revolutionary sentiment had decreased, but much to its surprise and terror it appeared from the beginning of the campaign in my behalf (which represented a social rather than a political movement) that supporters of the revolution of all colors had consolidated as a single unit around the radical candidacy which I represented, and they knew how to distinguish clearly the deceiving tendencies of a man, who, in spite of the many evils he has caused and still may cause through his defection from the revolutionary ranks, has produced the socially useful result of drawing the lines clearly between the false and the genuine revolutionaries of Mexico.

In any event, as the reaction has committed the turpitude of abandoning the ground of legality to place itself in a field in which it is undoubtedly weak—that of an armed struggle against the majority of farm workers and laborers, backed by a revolutionary government and army—let us . . . defend once more with arms the revolutionary principles represented by the Government of General Obregon now menaced by the new reactionaries, heirs of the traditions of Comonfort and Santa Ana.

In the face of this threat it is my duty, like that of all sincere revolutionaries, to offer my services to the President of the Republic and to place myself at his disposal so that he may use me in any place which, revolutionary soldier that I am, he deems advisable to give me. . . .

With the same enthusiasm with which they were working in the electoral campaign I know that the peasants and the laborers of the republic and the generous youth of the middle class which has responded to their sufferings and their anxieties, will offer their breasts to the reaction, to defend to the last the legal institutions of our country and to seal with their blood our agreement to labor energetically for the social betterment.

Imperial America in Haiti

THE tide of protest against the American occupation in Haiti appears to be rising again, largely as a result of the imposition of new internal taxes made necessary by the American loan. The following letters sent by M. Georges Sylvain, administrator of the Haitian Patriotic Union, and former minister plenipotentiary in Paris, to the editors of The Nation give one side of the picture.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Since the last letter I wrote you, the political situation of the country has grown worse.

January 1 is the constitutional date for the meeting of the primaries which have to elect the representatives and the senators. But Mr. Borno is against any primaries, because it is much easier for him to govern without any Haitian control with the so-called Councilors of State, who are appointed by him and subject to dismissal at his own will. What is much more grave is that he is hiding behind the power of the Government of the United States, which, he claims, has consented to his preventing reconstruction of the legislative body. This has increased discontent all over the country.

Three well-known citizens, leaders of the national cause, were brutally arrested, in the course of a meeting at Cape Haitien, legally convened in a cinema-hall, by gendarmes under the command of marine officers, who entered the place under the pretext of restoring, although they had themselves disturbed, order by using brute force on the bystanders. These three gentlemen are Mr. Jolibois, editor of the Courrier Haitien, Elie Guérin, and Edouard Bénédict.

Mr. Jolibois, particularly hated by the American occupation, because he never ceases to denounce in his paper its abuses, was, in company with his two partners, giving a series of lectures throughout the country, urging election of the legislative body. Before the meeting took place, they had arrested without any reason and in contempt of the law the Wesleyan minister, Auguste Albert, a man universally held in great esteem, whose moral integrity commands the highest respect, because he was giving his help to the three nationalist leaders. For six days these three gentlemen have been kept in solitary confinement, falsely accused of having incited the people to riot.

The police magistrate of the court of Cape Haitien has not been allowed to communicate with the prisoners or to investigate the case. That means that the so-called Haitian Government does not intend to send them before their natural judges, but intends to have them court-martialed by American officers, from whom Mr. Borno expects a barbarous sentence.

Will you ask the Government of the United States that these three Haitian gentlemen, whose only crime is that of defending the rights of their fatherland, be tried by those to whom the law of the land gives the power to try them?

Port au Prince, October 22 GEORGES SYLVAIN

P. S. After the Government of the United States had ordered its military agents not to bring the three journalists arrested at Cape Haitien before a court martial but to let Haitian justice take its course, the local police magistrate ordered their release, since no crime had been charged against them. But the President, M. Louis Borno, was determined to have his revenge. He took up two items which had appeared in the Courrier Haitien several days before without attracting attention, and made them the basis for charges against its editors. Jolibois and Guérin have been put in jail again, and they, as well as those who were in charge of the paper in their absence, are to be persecuted anew. M. Borno's policy is so incoherent that even his friends cannot understand it. Popular discontent is mounting. Some have suggested to him that it might help to reestablish calm if he should return to legal administration by legislative elections.

October 31 G. S.

Another side of the picture, not without its shadows also, is given in the following letter from Senator Medill McCormick, chairman of the senatorial commission which investigated conditions in Haiti in 1921, to President Coolidge. The events to which M. Sylvain refers may have had something to do with Senator McCormick's letter.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I beg to refer again to the development of American policy in Haiti which we discussed very briefly when I was in Washington.

Peace is established throughout the republic. The peasant in his hut and the traveler are secure alike from governmental oppressors and from bandits, as they have not been in many a long day. The debt has been funded and moneys have been found for public works. A system of arterial highways is nearing completion. The cities for the first time in Haitian history are well policed, clean, and sanitary. For some months a legal adviser has been making studies looking to the improvement of the administration of justice, and an agricultural adviser has been making studies presumably looking to the increase in agricultural production. In my humble judgment, the information acquired by the legal and agricultural advisers ought to be translated into action. All Haiti is still under military or martial law and nothing, or practically nothing, has been done to improve Haitian agriculture, or to import into Haiti sires—swine, bulls, or draft animals—to improve the native breeds by crossing.

Your predecessor, during the campaign of 1920, severely condemned the policy of the Democratic administration in Haiti. A committee of the United States Senate, without regard to party, unanimously recommended a policy for Haiti which has been carried out in part, but which remains unfulfilled in so far as it proposed the reformation of the civil courts, the abolition of martial law, and the improvement of Haitian agriculture through the employment of American instructors trained at Tuskegee. Inquiry indicates that the American occupation, so-called, has been eminently successful in establishing and maintaining peace; in reorganizing the public finances, in taking measures for public health, in building highways, but that it has failed to give due emphasis to restoring the supremacy of the civil law and of the civil courts, and to the employment of those American agricultural instructors trained at Tuskegee who are best adapted to be stationed at points in the countryside for the instruction of the Haitian peasantry.

I have no disposition to pass any unfriendly judgment upon those Americans who have devotedly and effectively served the Haitian people. But I think the time has come when in the discharge of our duty to the Haitian people to secure their civil liberties, to develop their wealth we ought to send to Haiti a commission to inquire anew as to the facts, and to make recommendations to the governments of Haiti and of the United States. I venture to suggest that such a commission be composed of men like Dr. George Vincent, of New York; Albert George, of Chicago; President A. B. Denwiddie, of Tulane University, and Robert R. Moton, of Tuskegee.

Haiti Appeals to the World

DANTES BELLEGARDE, the Haitian diplomat whose speeches, particularly in behalf of the Hottentots, attracted such general attention in recent meetings of the Assembly of the League of Nations, signs the following appeal to the public opinion of the world:

Whereas, the Government of the United States of America intervened in the domestic affairs of the Republic of Haiti in July, 1915, although the Haitian people had committed no violation of the rules of international law and had not imperiled the lives or interests of American citizens;

Whereas, as a result of this intervention a convention was imposed upon the Republic of Haiti, in which the Government of the United States agreed to give its material aid to Haiti in order to develop the economic resources of the country, while reserving the right to name specialists to aid the technical advisers of the Haitian Government in the organization of certain public services;

Whereas, this convention has not been carried out in the benevolent spirit which was said to have inspired it, the promised aid has not been given, and the American officials appointed to serve in Haiti (whose technical competence has often been subject to question) have exceeded their role as counselors and have transformed themselves into veritable dictators—which is stated and proved in official documents transmitted to the Government at Washington, especially in a message from the President of Haiti to the President of the United States, dated January 24, 1921;

Whereas, the Republic of Haiti has been occupied by American troops since 1915, although it has never been at war with the United States and although domestic peace is assured there by a local gendarmerie commanded by American officers;

Whereas the unjustified prolongation of such a regime of military occupation is at once an intolerable violation of the principles of public international law and a humiliation for the Haitian nation, an attack upon its territorial integrity, and a limitation of the full exercise of its sovereignty;

Whereas, the Republic of Haiti is a charter member of the League of Nations and no people anxious for justice and respectful of law can be indifferent to the situation imposed;

Be it Resolved, that the International Union of Associations for the League of Nations should put the Haitian question upon the agenda of its next meeting, and that meanwhile it should ask all its members to interest public opinion in their respective countries in the fate of the Haitian people.

The Haitian Association for the League of Nations,
DANTES BELLEGARDE, President
